Thirdly, our interpretation of Sin has changed. Readers of Mr. Wicksteed's Leicester Conference paper (1900) know how much is involved in this. The point for us now is that we no longer think of penitence and the attainment of goodness as two different processes separated in time. Every moral state contains within it inseparably a turning away from evil and a turning to the good. These are the systole and diastole which are equally necessary to the rhythm of spiritual life. And we now lay the stress rather on the longing, aspiring hope directed to the higher life, than on the backward, remorseful glance at the lower. The old theories spoke often, not only of our sin as laid upon Christ, but also of his righteousness as imputed to us. Each of these teachings was imperfect while regarded apart: but we now see that together they symbolised a great truth. If then, on other grounds we have felt constrained to concede a real heart of truth to the Atonement doctrine, the point now urged will remove objections aimed at the unreal isolation of "sin" as if it were a separate factor standing apart among the interests of life, to be specially treated for by means of Atonement transactions. The two sides of our being do not stand apart in this way, and fact overleaps the oppositions of theory. The larger penitence of the whole Christian brotherhood of souls is saturated through and through with something infinitely more than penitence. The "sense of sin" is "nought but an undertone in the sense of salvation."

6. If, then, the word "Atonement" must be abandoned because of its obsolete implications, the reality which these enshrined is a permanent possession. The idea must also be given up that it is only the Cross of Christ that saves; it is the Cross of Christ's whole Church that is lifted up in the wilderness. Not that the common experience of the Body of Christ is to be whittled down to the commonplace of social "responsibility"—it is not Man in the general sense that saves, but the "second Man, from (or of) heaven." Together with this change there come others not less radical. If we are to get away from a forensic Atonement, it will be by rising above, and not by sinking below it. We do sink below it when we make God a Force and the punishment of sin an incident in natural causal sequences. Sin must be shown as not less but as more terrible a fact than before. If, along with these requirements, we find that the old Deistic apartness of God has lost its meaning for our theology; that He is at His highest for us as the Life that has worked in and through the Christian Tradition: if also we find that we are what we are not as disconnected persons, but as partakers in a great development, the most significant that has come upon the world's stage: then we are compelled to interpret all the great words of religion—Repentance, Regeneration, Faith—in that connection. The individualist picture-theory of man's relations with God cannot survive. This, however, does not mean that we cravenly depend on a work that is done for us. Rather, we refer our own work to it, join ourselves to its efficacious Might, hide ourselves in the "cleft" of its "Rock of Ages." This fact, this Divine-human sorrow, this Joy in Penitence, is at once our smiting reproach and our blissful triumph. Unitarians must not break in here with "But we cannot profit by the merits of others"; for that would be to bring back again the very notions of guilt, &c., which they have combated in other creeds. "Merit lives from man to man, And not from man, O Lord, to Thee." Neither must they say, "The affair is exclusively between my soul and God," for that would show that they have not thoroughly asked, "What is God?" And we must get away from the view that ours is a ready-made moral situation upon which the supposed Atonement might conceivably have supervened as a means of cutting the knot. On the contrary, the appearance in the world of Christ and the rest of the Christian Facts has largely created the moral situation; both our sense of sin and our deliverance from it being stages in the same work of Christianity.

7. The reflection may now occur that the doctrine of the Cross has been made to cover a great many ideas and motives that are usually allotted to other branches of theology. But this is a necessity that has a historical origin. Protestantism has never been quite able to do justice, in its dogmatic, to that essential collectivism which Romanism emphasised so strongly in the interwoven fabric of spiritual interests built up by its prayers for the dead, intercession of saints, sacraments, &c. But at the moment of the Reformation, even the Teutonic nations, with all their individualism, felt the need of ideas and motives which should perpetuate the contact of the individual soul with the great concrete historical work of Salvation, which is for ever going forward amidst the clashing human tide; and it was mainly through "Atonement" theories (except in the half-hearted Catholicism of the Anglican compromise) that these ideas and motives obtained whatever expression they did obtain. For Romanism, the great matters of Sin and Redemption had been symbolised in sacraments and a regulated moralism. Protestantism found all these things sufficiently stored up in the One supreme Sacrifice. The interior meaning of the Reformation was right, if ever any meaning was right in this world, viz., to spiritualise all this collective institutionalism of Rome. And we cannot undo our ancestry. We are unfaithful to it, when, in an age as little disposed as that of the Reformers to re-vivify a dead institutionalism, we cast away the one teaching which, when its root is laid open to view, is visibly fitted to join the isolated Christian soul to the great company of the faithful and the cloud of witnesses. Fortunately, our Unitarian tradition has been truer in its feeling than in its dialectic. An example of this is Martineau's thrilling outcry, "Ah, thou who sorrowest unto death, We conquer in thy mortal fray," where all that is dearest to the soul of the Church is conveyed. He is less helpful, when, writing against the Mauricians* and asking, "What was the problem which required Christ to die?" he rejects the possibility that "Platonic Realism" can "enter on the region of the Conscience, and gather up our infinitely distributed trusts into an incarnate εἶδος of humanity." "Obligation cannot be discharged by deputy." But we may make appeal from this controversy-dimmed atmosphere, to passages where spiritual pleadings lift him to a grander prospect: passages where the "organic constitution of humanity"† furnishes the apologia for a religion "which in order to become social must be historical"; where the "shrinking historical nucleus of reports" concerning the Ideal Man‡ suggests a process going on in his mind which, if it could have been continued longer, would surely have compelled him (like E. Caird and Loisy) to find his voucher for that Ideal Man in the developed Life of Christ's Church; where, in fact, upon his own doctrine of development "Christianity becomes, not the Creed of its Founders, but the religion of Christendom."§

NOTE.—The quotation from Browning, in the previous article, should be continued to "See the Christ stand."

INSTEAD of thinking that the ministry is a refuge for dulness, and that whoever can escape from the plough is fit for God's spiritual husbandry, we ought to feel that no profession demands more enlarged thinking and more various acquisitions of truth.—Channing.

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LONDON AND THE SOUTH-EASTERN COUNTIES.

THIRD ANNUAL REPORT ON PUBLIC QUESTIONS.

THE Report of this Committee on public questions, presented to the annual meeting at Newbury on Wednesday, after reference to the Education and Licensing Acts, and the necessity for amendment or repeal, touched upon the decision in the Scottish case, of which it said:—"The decision is clearly the triumph of the 'Dead Hand' over the forces of theological and ecclesiastical progress; but it may eventually serve to bring about the triumph of honesty and Christian manhood over impossible compromises and unworthy evasions of the claims of truth. Our Assembly, which stands for the principle of non-subscription in theological formulas, and the Open Door to pulpit, pew, and college, will watch with interest the developments consequent upon this memorable decision, and will sympathise with those who are finding the old restrictions too narrow for to-day's faith and are learning that freedom to grow must be bought with a price."

The Report then continued as follows:—

"When we come to consider the conditions of our own people, we are faced by the fact that large numbers of them; indeed, a large proportion of the whole population, are living in a state of poverty that is always debasing, and frequently involves acute distress. This destitution exists as a harsh and perplexing contrast to our ideal of brotherhood. The percentage of the population thus involved is indeed somewhat less than in former generations; but the actual number living in poverty at the present time is probably in excess of the total population of the country a century ago. This question is too large to be dealt with adequately in the present report; but your Committee desire to bring it to the notice of the churches, and especially to direct attention to two of its phases, which have assumed some prominence in the past year.

"The first of these relates to the children. The recent publication of the Report of the Inter-Departmental Committee on Physical Deterioration has shown once more that large numbers of children attending the elementary schools are not sufficiently nourished to gain any advantage from the lessons, while the underfeeding and mal-nutrition result in stunted growth, impaired physique, and numerous forms of active disease. The opinion has been expressed by some of the witnesses that this evil can only be remedied by the communal feeding of children who are compelled to attend the communal schools. As to the method to be adopted your Committee express no opinion. But they desire to assert that side by side with the parental responsibility there is a concurrent responsibility of the community to see that its children shall not be deprived of the opportunity of a healthy life.

"A second aspect of the question of poverty relates to adults. There is at all times a considerable number of unemployed in the country. Side by side with those who cannot or will not work are those who are unable to find employment. The amount of distress last year from this cause was far above the average. The conditions now are worse than a year ago. Part of the suffering which annually faces us in the winter results from the inclemency of the season; but, even if the coming winter should be a mild one, the fact of an excessive number of unemployed will remain. This is simply a result of the depression of trade. The number now unemployed from this cause is very large, and is in excess of the average of the last ten years. These men and women suffer from no fault of their own, and from causes over which they have no control, and through the working of a system of wealth production sanctioned and adopted by the nation. The duty therefore becomes incumbent on us to consider how the wealth of the community may be made available for their support.

"Abroad the chief event that calls for consideration on moral and religious grounds has been the incursion into Thibet, and the enforcing there of a commercial treaty, and the prohibition of other foreign Powers than the English from acquiring any footing in the country. Since the first accounts of the slaughter of the Thibetans in one or two early engagements, scarcely any particulars have reached the public as to the actual number of lives sacrificed in this expedition. It is a significant fact that even the provisions of the treaty have become known to the people of England through the Chinese Government. Our losses in the expedition appear to have been few, but there is reason to fear that the sufferings and losses of the Thibetans in defence of their country have been very great. It must be a source of profound regret to the followers of the Prince of Peace that we have again endeavoured to extend our civilisation and commerce by methods of war. However persistently such expeditions may be spoken of as political or commercial necessities, they testify to the failure of our civilisation, trade and religion, to make themselves acceptable by their own inherent merits.

"The unspeakable evils associated with all war are manifesting themselves only too plainly in the terrible war now being waged in the Far East. The accounts daily received must fill all civilised communities with horror. Even in the countries actually engaged in the war there appears to be arising to some extent a re-action in favour of methods of peace. It should not be forgotten that it is one of the first duties of all Christian Churches to use every means of reason and persuasion to inculcate a nobler spirit than that of international strife and conquest, and to advocate the spread of the principles of arbitration with peaceful settlement of international as well as domestic questions."

SPREAD THE LIGHT.

SIR,—May I be allowed to make a suggestion on the matter treated of by Mr. Pope under the above heading in last week's INQUIRER. A few of the members of Trafalgar-street Unitarian Church, Burnley, have contrived to add their mite towards the support of the Hibbert Journal without touching upon the funds of their church, at the same time securing for themselves the privilege of reading the most up-to-date researches in the domains of theology and philosophy. Eight or ten members have formed a sort of club to subscribe for one copy of the Journal, which is passed round to each in turn, and the copies will ultimately find a place in the congregational library for the common use of all the members. Surely a similar group might be organised in every Unitarian church in the country, however small, and no minister with any enterprise need go without his Hibbert Journal. In this way distinct encouragement and help would be given to what is unquestionably the ablest and most promising effort of its kind which has ever been attempted. It would be a reproach to our churches if they were to allow such a splendid publication to fail without having at least done their best to secure its permanence.

LONG SUTTON, LINCOLNSHIRE.

APPEAL.

SIR,—As one who has had frequent opportunities of becoming acquainted with the good work carried on by the Rev. W. J. Pond, I am constrained to offer a word in support of the recent appeal of the Long Sutton congregation for aid in restoring their ancient building.

The original appeal was for £100, but, it having been found impossible to repair the western end of the building, it will be needful to rebuild that portion on a concrete foundation, thereby increasing the estimate to £150.

Towards this amount the congregation (composed entirely of poor people) guarantees £20. The appeal has only brought £30 at present. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association have generously guaranteed £20, and expressed the hope that "Unitarians throughout the Eastern Union and other places will come to their assistance, so that the work may be done speedily."

Should the remaining £80 be contributed during the next two weeks, it may be possible to carry out the work at once, otherwise, the congregation will suffer great discomfiture, and be exposed to danger throughout the winter.

OBITUARY.

THE REV. JOHN DAVIES.

THE death of the Rev. John Davies removes a veteran to well-earned rest. He was born in 1821 at Eardisley, in Herefordshire, on the borders of Wales. He lost his mother in infancy, and was brought up at Wotton-under-Edge by his uncle, John Forsbury, a radical bootseller, well known in those days as a Unitarian lecturer, who suffered a good deal for his opinions. John Davies distinguished himself in classics at the local grammar school, and proceeded, we believe, with the aid of a Dr. Williams' scholarship, to Glasgow University in 1839. Among his friends and fellow students there were George Dawson and H. D. Morell, afterwards known as one of H.M. School Inspectors. In 1842 he took his M.A. degree there, and in the autumn of the same year entered as a divinity student at Manchester New College, lately returned to Manchester. Here he found James Martineau, Professor of Mental and Moral Philosophy. Martineau was then making his way to his new position which recognised the seat of authority in religion not in the Bible, not in the evidence of miracle and the fulfilment of prophecy, but in the living Spirit, the direct voice of God speaking through conscience and the spiritual affections of man. It is to the lasting honour of John Davies that he became, no doubt largely owing to John Forsbury's influence, one of the first of the adherents of Martineau's new position, and that in his last college year he wrote a sermon to preach before the professors, in which he clearly set forth his inability to accept the old basis of religion. We know with what antagonism Martineau was himself regarded by the older school of Unitarians on account of his new views, and how nearly he was driven from England to take refuge in America. Now, in 1904, we all know how great a prophet Martineau has been. We have all followed him in his change, and know that this has saved our churches from extinction. But this was not known sixty years ago, and the obloquy which fell upon the prophet, and constituted his first reward, was felt in even greater weight by the first disciples who received him as a prophet. John Davies preached as a candidate in vacant pulpits, and preached we are told with much acceptance. It is clear that he wished to obtain a ministerial settlement and did not himself feel debarred by any doubts from preaching the Gospel of the Divine Fatherhood which formed the sum and substance of his later religious teaching. But there always came a letter from the college authorities, warning the congregation of his new views, and no invitation followed. He never forgot how he was befriended by John James Tayler. But he was refused the usual certificate which described the retiring student as "duly qualified" for the Christian ministry among Protestant Dissenters." Men whose connection with the college is now generally forgotten were making great efforts in the "Forties" on behalf of what they honestly believed to be the truth.

So John Davies failed to get a pulpit and devoted himself to teaching, for which he was well qualified. Not till about 1855, did he receive his first ministerial appointment at Newport, I.W., and this he held only for one year, returning to schoolkeeping at Stand, near Manchester. In 1872 he was appointed minister at Tavistock, and the following year he was invited to become the colleague of the Rev. R. L. Carpenter at Bridport, in order to take special charge of the evening service and of the Sunday-school and its allied institutions. To carry on the education of his son and to add to his own very limited income, he had four or five lads to live in the house with him, and gave them a good grammar school training. His two-fold task was done with a thoroughness which must have meant a severe strain. The study fire had to be lit every morning by four o'clock; the boys began their work at six, and the master must have a couple of quiet hours first for his own preparation. Then in the evening he had nearly always some meetings to attend. The mutual improvement society became a splendid institution under his leadership. Temperance work both in connection with the chapel and in the town claimed his earnest support. But it was in the Sunday-school, on those who were small boys when he came, and grew up under him to be men, that his influence was most deeply felt. The boys' Sunday-school had the services of a highly competent schoolmaster, who brought the experience of many years to the religious training of the young. And there are those both among his private pupils and his Sunday scholars who can tell how this influence brought about the great spiritual change in their lives. Something, variously described as conversion or the new birth, takes place. It is the birth and growth of the immortal soul within us, and when we know under whose influence this has come about no one else can ever hold the same place in our religious regard. In his case it was an influence not won without having to undergo some of the hardest and saddest trials that can befall a man. The strain of life can be borne comparatively easily while we and those we love enjoy good health, but there came years when the doctor's attendance at his house never ceased, and the death of his only child, a young man of real promise, who was training for the ministry, was quickly followed by the death of his wife. We may picture the lonely man sitting in his little study reading over the letters which were all that remained to speak to him the words of those whom he had lost, and weeping over the remembrance of what never again could be on earth.

From that time, 1886, this world must have seemed very different to him. The following year, he retired along with Mr. Carpenter from the active ministry. But what tasks he could still perform he was ready to undertake, however irksome they might be. Sunday after Sunday he would spend the morning service in a certain "cage," keeping unruly boys in order. Latterly, his infirmities would not permit his attendance at any public meeting. But he could still have children to his own room and give them, gratis, some training in music or in the temperance work he loved so well. To the last he took much physical exercise, and long after he had given up his school he might be found many a morning reading a Greek play.

In politics he was a firm Liberal. In this respect advancing years brought no change, and the zeal for reform with which he was first imbued by John Forsbury he certainly handed on unimpaired to a younger generation. One other feature in his character struck all who knew him. It was his modesty and reserve. He had a disposition absolutely free from vanity, but by no means free from pride, and with this went a quiet, retiring manner which must have stood in the way of his worldly advancement, and of his social intercourse. It did not hinder the appreciation of old friends, but it was difficult for a new acquaintance to learn to understand him.

The thirteen years of his joint ministry with Mr. Carpenter were years of fine service. The mutual appreciation felt by these two men for one another, and their absolute loyalty to each other, were very beautiful, and enabled them to divide the duties of their joint ministry, and each perform that for which he was best fitted, with the most perfect and generous accord.

At the annual meeting of the Bridport Unitarian congregation on Oct. 12 a resolution warmly appreciative of Mr. Davies' services was passed. A special meeting of Sunday-school teachers was held last Sunday morning, and here those who had been his old scholars and colleagues in Sunday-school work bore testimony to the influence he had exerted on their lives, and the following resolution was carried by all silently rising to express their assent:—

That this meeting of the teachers of the Unitarian Sunday-school learns with deep regret of the death of their former teacher, superintendent, and minister, the Rev. John Davies, M.A., and desires to place on record his devotedness and persuasiveness as a teacher, his ever ready sympathy, his efforts in connection with the temperance society, the Band of Hope, and the mutual improvement society; his eagerness to help the young in ways of righteousness, his kindness as a friend, and his faithfulness as a minister of the Master whom he truly served.

H. S. S.

THE Christian Register of Oct. 6 contains several tributes to the late George Frisbie Hoar, who at the time of his death was senior Senator of Massachusetts. Among them is the address given by his old friend, Dr. Edward Everett Hale, at the funeral on Oct. 3. Born in 1826 the late Senator had been for over fifty years in public life. "He stands," said a political opponent, a few days before his death, "for a good many of the ideals of New England character. A scholar of recognised rank, a politician without guile, a public official whose integrity is as clear as the sunlight, and a partisan who holds his conscience superior to party, a man as pure in public life as he is in his private relations." "A Puritan of the seventh generation," as he liked to call himself, he was one of the chief of those honourable laymen who have added so much to the strength of American Unitarianism.

MUSINGS.

BY A MINISTER.

IV.

MY good friend and neighbour, Robinson, says that the turning of the other cheek in the Sermon on the Mount is nothing more than the turning of the face to invite the kiss of peace. I cannot go with him in this. The moral in each of the three cases presented seems to be that patience should have her perfect work, should not only suffer wrongfully, but should also suffer that further wrong which non-resistance nearly always provokes. To the loss of the coat is added the loss of the cloke, to the compulsion to go one mile is added the compulsion to go two miles; the symmetry of the whole passage demands the smiting of the left cheek in addition to the smiting of the right. It is one of the penalties of patience to be smitten for being patient.

Robinson thinks that such perfect work lies outside the field of practical ethics; the practicable in this world, he says, must always be the imperfect.

To this I reply that perfection can no more be excluded in morals than it can be excluded in art. The art teacher assumes the love of perfection, assumes that the student will desire it and aim at it; that, having no hope of reaching it, he will always be disappointed at missing it. In like manner the teacher of ethics must set forth the ethical ideal. His counsels must be counsels of perfection. He must not leave it to another coming after him to point a higher lesson. In these particular three cases retaliation, as the outcome of passion and pride, would be nearly as wrong as the wrong received; when private feeling and personal interest alone are concerned, moral perfection lies in non-resistance.

And when the public good is in question?

Then another rule comes into play. If he hear thee not, take two or three witnesses; if he refuse to hear them, tell it unto the church. Injury done to social order must be dealt with by that social action in which vindictiveness has no part. On the ground of public justice Christ himself allows himself to say, "If I have spoken well, why smitest thou me?"

But in practice why teach the impracticable, and not some adapted form of goodness?

Because we do not really know the limits of the practicable. Man must be fitted to the doctrine, and not the doctrine to man. Once lower the pattern showed us in the Mount to present-day realities, and it ceases to be a pattern. If you do but teach a child to write, you give him the best example that art can produce. He does better for aiming at the best.

Here Jones breaks in. Jones is the local lawgiver and general dictator, of whom we are all a little afraid.

"A rule which is never obeyed," he exclaims, "is no rule at all, and it is a bit of Christian pretence to profess to live by the Sermon on the Mount. Those sayings about meekness are purely proverbial, rhetorical exaggerations for the sake of emphasis. Those who heard them received them with deductions, and we may do the same. In all these cases of insult, and so on, we must be guided by circumstance."

I fell to wondering whether circumstance of itself would ever lead us to rise above it. When I listened again, Jones was indignantly finding fault with the rector of the parish.

"Whose ox has he taken?" I asked.

He would say nothing as to that; all he knew was that he was a disgrace to his cloth.

The truth was that the rector, who is one of the meekest of men, had suffered himself to use some slight expression of impatience concerning Jones. It is clear to me now that Jones also has his counsels of perfection, and is, without knowing it, a worshipper of the ideal.

BIBLE SCENES.

IV.—THE WONDER-WORKER.

THERE is a sort of wonder story in the Book of Kings which seems as if it were intended to make a miracle play, or had been made out of one. It is the story of Elijah. He appears suddenly in the history as if from nowhere, though he is said to be from Gilead. He threatens King Ahab, he foretells a frightful famine to be caused by want of rain; he goes away, and is kept alive by miraculous help; he raises the son of a widow from the dead, and multiplies the meal and the oil on which she lived, just as Jesus is related to have multiplied loaves of bread; and in the end he does not die as other men, but is carried up into heaven by a whirlwind and chariots of fire. It is altogether one of the strangest stories in the Bible. We may never have the opportunity to see and hear it as a miracle play, and perhaps we should not enjoy it in that form. But the story, or part of it, has been set to music, and you may very likely hear it as an oratorio.

The one thing to understand throughout the story is that Elijah is represented as a sort of champion of the true God of Israel. And it is his work always to act for the honour of Jehovah the one true God, and to oppose the wicked worship of false gods, particularly of Baal and Asherah, a god and goddess, whose worship led to evil manners. It is exciting to read how this great prophet rebuked the King, Ahab, how he challenged him to gather all the prophets of Baal together upon some suitable gathering-place on Mount Carmel. How the King obediently sent word and caused them all to come. How there, on that lofty spot, Elijah stood forth in the midst of a vast assembly of people, and asked them how long they meant to dance to and fro between two religions. If Jehovah be your God, said he, serve Him. He then went on to make a challenge. He declared that he was the only prophet of Jehovah, but the prophets of Baal were 450. Let those 450 worship their god with sacrifice and prayers, he said; and then I will call on Jehovah, and he that answers by fire, let him be God. The people shouted their approval of the test. And the story tells us how this was done: that the 450 prophets sacrificed a bullock and prayed to their god. They used not many words, but kept crying louder and still louder, "O Baal, hear us." Nothing happened. They cut themselves, partly in excitement and partly perhaps that this very blood might cause their god to take notice. Still no answer. And Elijah mocked them, asked them if their God was perhaps asleep or gone out for a little while. When at last, wearied and helpless, they have to give over, it is Elijah's turn to begin. He repairs the altar of Jehovah; causes a great quantity of water to be poured over the sacrifice that he offers, then speaks a few quiet words of prayer. And the fire from Heaven comes down, burns up the wood, the sacrifice, devours everything before it, all the water being quite useless to stay its furious course. All the people see this great sight, and cry: "Jehovah he is God, Jehovah he is God!" Up to this point all our sympathy is with the one strong man standing alone. But when we read that, flushed with his victory, he shouts: "Take the prophets of Baal, let not one of them escape," and when we read that the great meeting on Carmel was finished by the killing of 450 men, our sympathies go over to the other side. Then he is not a brave defender of the right, he is a horrible persecutor. This great wonder-worker, whose story is told in the history of Israel is the true picture of a great religious reformer. Strong to oppose what is wrong, brave to defend what is right, acting like a hero when all the world is against him; he too readily acts like a tyrant and a persecutor as soon as he gets power into his own hands.

It is, therefore, a relief to us when we read how very human this great wonder-worker still proved to be. When Queen Jezebel threatened to lay hands on him, he went away into hiding; a terrible feeling of loneliness came over him, and he wished that he might die. Forgetting his own harsh deeds, he complained that he only remained a prophet of Jehovah, and said he: "They seek my life to take it away." A sort of wonderment possessed him, to think that he should be persecuted. It is well that there was no one of the Baal worshippers by to mock him in his distress. According to the Oratorio, which follows closely the Bible story, an angel soothed his weariness by singing: "O rest in the Lord, wait patiently for Him." Do not say this was kinder treatment than he deserved. God does not wait till we are perfectly good and consistent before He listens to our prayers, and grants us peace. Otherwise very few could dare to trust in God at all. We read that when Archbishop Laud, who had so bitterly persecuted the Puritan party in England, found himself at length on the losing side, and was thrown into prison, he took much comfort from the ninety-third Psalm:—

> The floods have risen, O Lord,
> The floods lift up their voice,
> The waves of the sea are mighty, and rage horribly:
> But yet the Lord who dwelleth on high is mightier.

It was quite right that he should find comfort in affliction by remembering that God was stronger than his enemies. But it had been better if he had never persecuted and scourged and mutilated good men. So we sympathise with Elijah in the day of his weakness. But we learn from his career not to mock other men's mistakes, not to be harsh and bitter towards those whose religion or whose way of life seems to us blamable; but to remember that before God our own case is as theirs.

LIBERAL RELIGION IN GERMANY.

IT was a privilege and a pleasure, which the Editor of this journal valued very highly, to be allowed, as representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, to attend the meetings of the "Freunde der Christlichen Welt" at Eisenach, and of the Protestanten-Verein in Berlin, of which reports appeared in the last two numbers of the INQUIRER. We could have wished that it had been possible to repeat our happy experience of last year, and to be present also at the meetings of the Netherlands Protestantenbond, to be held at Dordrecht on Tuesday and Wednesday next; but we must be content this year to send a message of very cordial greeting.

The German Protestanten-Verein, founded in 1863, the Netherlands Protestantenbond, founded 1870, and the Swiss Verein für freies Christentum, founded 1871, are Unions closely akin in constitution and methods of work, as also in their central purpose, to vindicate the claims of liberal religious thought and life in the Protestant churches of their several lands. We noted, in our report last week, the dual character of the Protestanten-Verein, with its popular union in the Pfalz, numbering 18,000 members, and the local unions in the rest of Germany, with some 5,000 members in all. The last report of the Protestantenbond gives the membership in the Netherlands as 18,280, gathered for the most part into 156 local unions, while in the Swiss union there are 13 cantonal divisions, and a total membership of about 4,000. The work of these unions is directed, for the most part, towards strengthening the forces of liberalism in the great churches of the land, and therein their position and aims differ very widely from those of our British and Foreign Unitarian Association, to which no such opportunity is open. In the Netherlands, indeed, there is no established church, and the Protestantenbond gathers its members, not only from the Reformed Church, which holds the first place, and was formerly the established church of the country, but from the Remonstrants, the Mennonites, the Lutherans, and the Free congregations; its work would be similar to the home work of our Association, if we united in our membership Broad Churchmen, liberal Congregationalists, Baptists, and Wesleyans, as well as Unitarians, and worked for liberal religion in each of those communions. But in Germany and Switzerland (in the Protestant Cantons) the Established churches in the country, whether Lutheran, Reformed, or "United," contain, nominally at any rate, within their fold nearly all the forces of religious liberalism, as well as of orthodoxy, and it is the task of the Protestanten-Verein to strengthen the hands of those who uphold liberal principles, and secure a freer field for the religious activity of liberalism within the borders of the Church.

In Germany the "Freunde der Christlichen Welt" are working practically for the same end, and it is greatly to be desired that the two Unions, if they are to remain separate, with differences of administration should yet realise that they are moved essentially by the same spirit, and are at one in their endeavours both to advance the progress of religious thought, and to reform the order and methods of church life in their native land. We, for our part, must follow with cordial sympathy the efforts of both Unions. The forces of reaction and obscurantism are so powerful, especially in high places in the Church, that every effort on the other side is to be welcomed and encouraged, and so far as possible unity of action and the heartiest co-operation secured.

Our work in this country, so far as it is concerned with church order, is of a very different kind. In Germany they are working to liberalise the Church; we have entered into our inheritance of freedom. Other churches in the land have still to find that better way, but for us the calling is to prove that Free Churches can be equal to their high trust, and religion in a free people can minister effectually to every need. It is on the inward side of faith that our aim is the same as that of our brethren in Germany, and in the practical activities of personal religion, which are demanded under every form of Church order. They also realise that religion must be made once more effective in the life of the people, established on a sure basis, in the light of modern knowledge; and that if the masses of the people are again to be gathered in, it must be demonstrated to them by methods of practical service, that religion is seriously concerned with their every-day life, and is able to help them in what they feel to be their deepest needs.

On the side of scholarship we are immensely indebted to Germany, and it is with a very keen interest that we must follow the efforts now being made in that country, both by public lectures and by the various series of hand-books, some of which were mentioned in our report of the Eisenach meetings, to popularise the results of modern research in the study of the Bible and Christian history, and other great religions of the world. Perhaps our experience in this country, and the work of our best men, may also be of some service, as we should earnestly wish to be the case, in pressing home that popular appeal.

On the social side of religious activity there was evidence at the Berlin meetings that the responsibility of the Church was keenly felt. The discussion of religious questions, not only from the pulpit, but in frank debate with the people on week evenings, was one of the methods advocated for bringing the sincerity of religious teaching home to the popular mind; and even more significant was the address by Mr. WALTER CLASSEN, of Hamburg, who had made a first-hand study of English methods by a residence at Toynbee Hall. He is now actively engaged in an admirable work of teaching and personal influence among the poor, in boys' clubs and other social activities, which have been established in his city, and he spoke with great force of the opportunities thus offered for getting at the heart of the people, and bringing religion, as an uplifting and refining power, to bear directly on their daily life. If a strong plea was also made for giving women an equal franchise with men in church government, and vindicating their right to equal responsibilities in the practical administrations of religion (but not yet, in Germany, in the pulpit!), that also made for a strengthening of its effectiveness on the social side, and bringing it into closer touch with the practical realities of life.

That the clergy must be not only active in services of practical helpfulness, but in touch with the social aspirations of the people, and familiar with the great problems of society, was also urged as a pressing need of the time. We referred in our Berlin report to the discussion on the Church and Social Democracy as perhaps the most notable of the whole week. With much force the opening address advocated sympathy and not hostility towards the ideal of social democracy, and pleaded for competent knowledge and a thorough study of the literature of the subject before burning questions of controversy were touched upon in public. Truthfulness, justice, and genuine brotherly sympathy must be manifestly motive powers in the Church if the people are to be won and to find once more that there is a gospel for the weary and heavy laden, a gospel truly of joy; such was the burden of the address, and the response it awakened was a good omen for the coming time.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

OPENING OF THE SESSION.

THE public lecture at the opening of the session was given at Manchester College on Monday afternoon, by the Rev. J. Edwin Odgers, M.A., D.D., Hibbert Lecturer in Ecclesiastical History.

The subject of the lecture was "Some Points in the Study of Early Christian Life in Relation to its Surroundings," to which he was led, Dr. Odgers said, by the fact that his first year's course during the coming session was to deal with the contact of Christianity with Paganism. The history of Christianity was often regarded and written in a manner predominantly traditionary, and often purely artificial; even if it was not avowedly written for purposes of controversy, it was constantly taken out of the sphere of scientific study by the assumption that, as the subject was divine, its process must be unique. So the give-and-take of the life of thought, the varying tones of spiritual emphasis, the influence of environment were constantly ignored in the interest of some supposed necessity of continuity and uniformity. That was not the way in which their studies would be pursued. They would study so-called heresy in the sense of Aubé's words: "In the beginning heresy is everywhere, for everything is new." In studying Christian doctrine they must understand the surrounding thought with which it came into contact, and note the bearing, e.g., of the early Gnosticism and Manichæism, and where history failed them for a knowledge of Christian life they would often have to turn to archæology and to folk-lore. The late J. R. Green marked an epoch in the study when he said that political history was only intelligible when based on social history.

In their study of Christian life in relation to its surroundings they would note, the lecturer said, that where two religions, or two conceptions of life, were face to face with one another, they exerted a mutual influence, first, by way of repugnance and opposition, and then by way of interpenetration. Thus, on the shock of contact with heathen life the disciple of Jesus drew back into his moral consciousness rather than to his doctrinal certitude. In the "Teaching of the Twelve Apostles," the instruction given to a candidate for baptism was moral, and in other early literatures, as in the Epistle to Diognetus and Minucius Felix, it was life rather than doctrine that was the justification of the Christian. It was a life intensely ascetic, the direct ancestor of that Puritanism which, grown sour in the fourth century, declared that sin after baptism could not be forgiven, and that the lapsed could not be restored.

The lecturer then proceeded to describe the nature of that world with which in the second century the Church found that it must live in contact. There was in it the religion of Greek poetry, so fiercely attacked by the Christians for its immoral and degrading stories, which, however, Neo-Platonism explained away and showed to be capable of the most spiritual interpretations. Then there was the religio civilis, the significance of which was seen in the provinces rather than in Rome itself, the symbol of the unity of law, the even hand of government, the reality of the Pax Romana. The worship of the Emperor, the genius of the Republic, was insisted on, as a pledge of good citizenship, while other cults were left undisturbed, if they in their turn were also tolerant. But to the first Christians the demand of such sacrifice meant a loathsome apostasy. Side by side with the religio civilis the Christian everywhere found the religion of the mysteries, such worship as that of Isis or of Mythras, in which there was a sacramental faith and personal relation to the deity, and the teaching of a lively hope of a future life. Thus Plutarch wrote to his wife on the death of their little daughter, that they who were both initiated into the mysteries, could not sorrow "even as others who have no hope." The close parallel which the Christians saw between these mysteries and their own faith they attributed to the Devil, who had imitated their rites; but the true solution was to be found not in this or that detail strained to make a case of borrowing or stealing, but in the broad fact of common needs asserting themselves in various periods of human history.

In the first century it was complained that Christians did not live as good citizens. The complaint in the third and fourth centuries was that Christianity set up to be unique and ultimate, and would not admit that it was on the way to a higher synthesis. But even that feeling was not strong enough to overcome the natural gregariousness of mankind, and the lecturer went on to give a number of most interesting illustrations of how heathen elements had been introduced into the popular Christian faith. Thus the doctrine of intermediate spirits led to a cult of angels, to which that of the martyrs was soon joined, and the festivals of the martyrs were intentionally substituted for the worship of the old deities. An instance of this was Gregory's advice to the Archbishop of Canterbury quoted by Bede: "By no means destroy the temples of the idols, but the idols, because the temples are well built," which was only carrying out the policy of the Celtic missionaries long before, in converting heathen buildings to Christian use. If the people would not give up the worship of an old stone, they cut a cross on it, and everyone was satisfied! In the same way the old festival of the sun in Rome, Dec. 25, the Dies Natalis Invicti Solis, connected with the worship of Mythras, was made the festival of the birth of Christ, and became Christmas Day.

With these and other still more curious instances, gathered from the results of recent research, Dr. Odgers showed how much has been done to broaden out and humanise the study of ecclesiastical history. The character of the lecture was such that no attempted summary can do justice to it, for its special interest and value consisted in the detailed illustrations which cannot be here reproduced. The lecture, we understand, will shortly be available as a whole in printed form.

MAY we so live, we dread not here to die,
So die, we dread not afterward to live.

MR. ARMSTRONG'S LECTURES.

"AGNOSTICISM, Scientific and Literary," was the title of Mr. Armstrong's third lecture delivered at Northampton on Sunday last, which was concerned with the writings and teachings of Huxley and Matthew Arnold. The story of the coining of the word "Agnostic," and the advantages of the use of that term, were clearly set forth; due tribute was paid to Huxley's love of veracity, his stern and uncompromising opposition to all haziness of thought, and to the heroic beauty of his character. A careful and destructive criticism of the great scientist's famous definition of the principle of Agnosticism revealed the fact that the Agnosticism of Huxley was primarily moral—"It is wrong for a man to say," &c., &c.—and showed also that, following on the lines of the definition, not only religious, but all scientific and ordinary beliefs must be abandoned as iniquitous in the holding, since without appealing to prime assumptions similar in their origin to those on which all theology rests, it is impossible to be certain of the objective truth of any proposition, or produce evidence that justifies that certainty. Huxley himself was a refuter of his own system, as one instance from his "Life and Letters" shows. He writes that he is convinced that the Divine government is wholly just.

The absolute justice of the system of things is as clear to me as any scientific fact. The ledger of the Almighty is strictly kept, and every one of us has the balance of his operations paid over to him at the end of every minute of his existence.

This and all such utterances allow of no scientific verification, they amount to the expression of sheer acts of faith, they rely on intuition and not on evidence: Contrary to Huxley's assertions and predictions, man's interest in the ultimate problems of existence is ever renewed, and the probability is that further scientific knowledge will by no means lessen his anxiety to find for himself an answer which he seeks in vain in the realms of natural science.

Matthew Arnold was considered as the literary exponent of Agnosticism; he chose, so the lecturer said, to be known by a limited number of incisive phrases which he continually employed; these phrases—household words almost with modern theologians—were submitted by Mr. Armstrong to a process of analysis which brought out a remarkable absence of lucidity almost indicating looseness of thought; the "tendency" which is a "stream," the "things" which "seek" are inconceivable, and the use of these terms in attempted definitions does but darken counsel: While no very high place can be given to Matthew Arnold as a constructive religious thinker, we owe of course a great debt to him as a conserver of all true culture, and in his poems find profound, if sometimes melancholy, religious feeling. That fact was emphasised by the last three verses of "Progress," most feelingly rendered by the lecturer.

IT matters everything to every man that he should be devotedly faithful to that which is divinest to his own soul.—H. W. Crosskey.

OUR CHURCHES:

(Conclusion.)

THERE seems to be a good deal of haphazard in the constitution and government of our churches, resulting not seldom in unpleasantness and difficulties which might easily be avoided. In some cases there is no roll of members and no duly appointed executive. In one congregation the qualifications for membership and even for office are merely nominal; in another they are almost prohibitive, and "the inner circle" which manages affairs is very close indeed. Many of our churches, I rejoice to think, conduct their business and keep their accounts in a truly admirable way; but, alas! there are not wanting others who are content to scramble along anyhow, and manage or mismanage their financial affairs as though the elements of bookkeeping had never been heard of. Generally, I hope it may be said, the minister is the trusted leader of his people, and whether or not a member of the committee (a matter which personally I consider is of the very least importance) he is consulted on all questions affecting the welfare of the congregation. But here and there one meets with ministers who groan under the bondage to which they are subjected, and the almost ostentatious want of consideration which they experience. So far from being esteemed "very highly in love for their work's sake," they are made to feel of how very little account their work is held. A chapel rule, e.g., which lays down that "the services shall be conducted by the minister under the direction of the Committee" is not without a certain significance in this connection. Imagine prayers being offered, or "Endeavours after the Christian Life" being prepared and preached "under the direction of the Committee"! This, of course, may be only one of those strange infelicities of expression into which even well-meaning people sometimes slip. Or it may be due to a feeling, which is quite honestly shared by some, that a stated, professional ministry is an evil, though a necessary one, and that those who belong to it must be made to know their place—and that a pretty low one. I am sure, however, that this is exceptional, and I only refer to it as such, and also because these cases produce a reaction, and lead some ministers, I fear, to assert claims for themselves and their office which are just as much to be regretted.

We have government by committee, government by wardens, government by trustees. And then all these varieties of government are again wonderfully diversified by the personalities of those connected with them. A system which, per se, is most open to objection, but if worked by men of judgment, good feeling, and devotion to the cause, will produce infinitely better results than another which may be faultless in theory, but has the misfortune to be worked by men who are wanting in the right spirit and have not got the root of the matter in them.

For this reason I am the less inclined to dogmatise as to the best form of congregational management. What is good in one place may not be the best in another. Association and habit are not to be disregarded, nor yet must mere conservatism, blind adherence to custom, be followed. Whatever method be adopted, provision should be made for varying from time to time the personnel of the governing body, so as to make it as representative as possible of the best life of the congregation.

It is desirable that membership should be made comprehensive, but, inasmuch as it involves privileges and responsibilities, it is reasonable to require some proof of fitness. A pecuniary qualification for religious fellowship, it is true, lends itself to ridicule, though it is not easy to suggest an alternative which is not invidious and inquisitorial as to conduct or faith. On the whole, a subscription which is sufficient to indicate seriousness of purpose, but not so high as to exclude any who really desire to join, may be justified on other grounds as well as on the very practical one that funds have to be provided. Might we not mend our ways by encouraging young people to take some share in the support of their church at an earlier age than is usual? As a rule, the working classes are probably never better off than between the ages of 18 and 23; then their income is more secure and, relatively to the claims they have to meet, perhaps larger than at any other period of their lives. That, therefore, is the very best time to form the habit, which will be beneficial to themselves as well as to the church, of setting apart something, however little, for the support of their religion.

I do not think there is any inconsistency in suggesting this and in, at the same time, believing that it is not desirable to enrol full members below the age of 21. A vote upon matters which may come before a congregation is as serious a matter as a vote at a Parliamentary election, and it would seem, therefore, that the same age qualification may be required in both cases. Some advantages would follow from thus deferring the bestowal of the franchise. In the first place, it would be more highly valued because not made too cheap; then, the business of the church would be less liable to suffer from the want of knowledge and experience in the management of its affairs; and, lastly, the idea of quid pro quo, that the vote is a sort of return for the subscription, would receive less encouragement; there would be a sense of higher responsibility attaching to it. It is dangerous, I am aware, in these days of "Vice Versa," to hint a doubt as to the fitness of young people for anything which they may fancy; we all stand in awe of them—either from fear or love. "How does the minister get on with the young people?" is with many the first and last question which determines his fitness. Again and again one hears the elders say, "We would prefer So-and-So; but, of course, the young ones are chiefly to be considered," and they, dear creatures, do not know their own mind, or, rather, they think one thing to-day and, quite naturally, something else next week. This altruism on the part of the elders is very fine and noble, within limits; but what is the use of experience if they who possess it resign their responsibilities for the sake of humouring those who, from the very necessities of the case, have less knowledge of the matter in hand and a less mature judgment for dealing with such knowledge as they possess? When we think of the sad results which often follow from one false step, we cannot fail to see the necessity of turning to account the best wisdom that is available.

In these articles I have been dealing mainly with secondary matters of Method which, however important in themselves, are yet not of the first importance. I have not touched upon the fundamental question of all: What is it that our churches really exist for? I know of no better answer than the familiar one: For the public worship of God and the moral and religious culture of their members. But I suppose other churches would give a similar answer; why, then, do we stand apart from them? Because they make demands which are untrue to our reason and conscience. If this be so, then the question of remaining apart is not one of choice for truth-loving men; if it be not so, then, as it seems to me, we are open to the grave charge of breaking the bond of unity without adequate cause. And so the most ardent seekers after peace, even those who hate controversy with all the detestation so vigorously and picturesquely expressed by the "Open Brotherhood," cannot escape from the necessity of realising to themselves, and, on fit occasions and in becoming manner, pointing out to others what seems the better way of striving after the goal, which is common to all.

But now, in these latter days, a further mission is proposed to the churches, with regard to which I have the misfortune to differ from many men, to whom I look up with heartfelt honour. It may seem presumptuous to express an opinion contrary to theirs; nevertheless, I cannot persuade myself that it would be anything but a serious disaster if the churches, as such (mark the qualification), were, save under very exceptional circumstances, to make political and social problems a direct part of their concern. That, indeed, the churches would fail in an essential element of their work if they did not inspire their adherents with principles and affections which will make them eager for the duties of citizenship, and of lovers of their kind, is an obvious truism. But the point is, whether questions which notoriously divide men equally good and earnest and able are to be dragged within the various church enclosures into which religious men are already separated, and therein to create fresh divisions; or, from those enclosures are men to be sent forth into the open world to discuss and work out these great problems? If the former alternative is adopted, I believe it will be bad for both the churches and the causes which we all desire to serve.

(1) It will be bad for the churches, because it will divert attention from their special function, for the fulfilment of which there is no other provision in the world, and it will introduce discussion and strife among people who have united themselves on the basis of sympathy about the highest and deepest things of life.

(2) It will be bad for the causes themselves, because they will inevitably become tainted through alliance with sectarian interests. How terribly education has suffered from this cause we all know only too well. No form of philanthropy appeals more strongly to our sympathies than the relief of suffering and disease; yet it would surely be an absurdity to establish Church hospitals and Unitarian dispensaries. In that department, at least we rejoice in the elimination of the ecclesiastical element and the co-operation of men of all churches who, at the call of suffering humanity, join hands in a common ministry. Why should not this type of union be aimed at among those who are moved to help in every other form of social service? It is part of a Liberal Education to unite with those from whom we differ in other matters in efforts about which we are agreed. Such union reacts beneficially on the way in which those very differences are held. Men who are working side by side for some great purpose learn to respect each other; they may still worship in different communions, but they will do so with a larger charity and in a spirit of mutual appreciation. The position for which I contend is greatly strengthened when we consider the large and, perhaps, increasing number of people who stand apart from all religious organisations, and yet are profoundly concerned for national righteousness and social well-being. I quite recognise that the view just indicated is not the one which finds favour for the time being. My excuse must be "that a truth is often most in season when it is least in favour." Moreover, there is always the chance of a change of sentiment. Within my lifetime, though not actually within my memory, the Independent Churches have effected a complete change of front with regard to Education. Fifty years ago they were opposed to all State intervention; now, with sounder wisdom, they would turn out everyone but the State.

I long to see our churches increase in numbers, and what is much more important, increase in strength and influence. If they do, we may be sure that in time to come, as in the time that is past, they will send forth into the community men and women who are quick to hear the call of social and public duty. A tree is known by its fruits. Sir George Trevelyan (I think it was) has laid it down that people never worship with those who believe less than themselves, and never vote for Parliamentary candidates who believe more than themselves. He points out that it is a comparatively rare thing for orthodox people to join in worship with those whom they regard as heretics, while it is common enough to find in orthodox churches people for whose belief no one would stand bail. On the other hand, at the time the statement was made there was not a single Roman Catholic sitting for an English constituency, while Unitarians were represented out of all proportion to their numbers. Objection may be taken to this way of measuring the more or less of belief; depth as well as area has to be reckoned. But at any rate we may be thankful that in the past Unitarian piety, never perhaps, very demonstrative, has not been without its fair contribution to the public good. Many a neighbourhood and good cause would to-day have been in worse condition but for those who worshipped "after the way which they call heresy." God forbid that we should boast of these things; but when it is proposed to reverse the old order it is just as well to remember what it has done for the world.

Many years ago the Rev. Charles Wicksteed read a paper, with some such title as "What is the matter with our Churches?" If I remember aright, he came to the conclusion, "not much." Whether his answer would be the same if he were still with us I cannot say; but the general opinion appears to be that all things with us are not as we would have them. It is wholesome for us to recognise that fact. It may put our courage and faith to the test; but if it leads us to look to our weak places, to use wisely our resources, to strengthen each other in the things that belong to our peace and salvation as a religious community, then assuredly we have not only a past for which to be thankful, but also a future for which we may rejoice to labour and hope.

JAMES HARWOOD.

NORTH MIDLAND PRESBYTERIAN AND UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THESE meetings were held on Monday and Tuesday at the High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham. On Monday evening a crowded reception was held in the schools, when Mr. J. C. Warren extended the welcome of the congregation to the President of the Association (Mr. J. Harrop White) and the ministers and delegates of the district churches. Both Mr. Warren and Mr. Harrop White in their addresses pleaded earnestly on behalf of the Association for greater personal and financial support. The evening's enjoyment was enhanced by some exceedingly fine music.

On Tuesday morning the annual business meeting was held. This was attended by nearly all the ministers and appointed delegates. After the roll had been called the hon. sec. (Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas) read the annual report of the Committee, extracts from which are appended.

THE REPORT.

The report gave details as to the proposed scheme for uniting the Lincoln and Newark congregations, which had fallen through, and the arrangement by which the minister of Christ Church, Nottingham, with lay assistance, undertakes the charge of the two congregations of Newark and Christ Church. It is hoped also, with the help of the B. and F.U.A., to join together Loughborough and Ilkeston under one ministry.

The treasurer's financial statement for the year ending Sept. 30, 1904, showed receipts in excess of payments; but there is a falling off in both subscriptions and collections.

The resignation of the Rev. Peter Dean, at Loughborough, and W. G. Price, at Hinckley, is noted with regret, and a welcome offered to Rev. E. S. Lang Buckland, settled at Derby. The Free Christian Church, Leicester, is congratulated on the recent settlement of the Rev. Gertrud von Petzold, M.A., to whom their warmest welcome is offered. After a cordial tribute to the lay preachers of the district for their noble help, the report concludes:—"The Committee would extend their sympathy and encouragement to the weaker churches who maintain a brave spirit in the face of much difficulty. They feel that every possible support should be given to such churches by the stronger congregations, and by this Association. Every year the principles of Liberal Religion are being more fully confirmed and justified, and from this fact the Committee would ask the constituent churches to derive fresh courage and a renewed conviction that their labour is not in vain."

The Hon. Treasurer, Mr. B. DOWSON, in presenting the financial statement, pointed out that, although a deficit had been turned into a balance in hand, this was not, from the Association's point of view, satisfactory, as it was the result of less work done, and consequently much less expenditure.

The B. and F.U.A. and the District Association.

The President, Mr. J. HARROP WHITE, in moving the adoption of the report and balance-sheet, spoke strongly on the relation between the North Midland Association and the B. and F.U.A. He disclaimed any desire to attack the latter, but he felt that they had not received the consideration which they had a right to expect. He recognised that the B. and F.U.A. had other work to do at home and abroad, but he felt that it had not acted generously in assuming the attitude it had towards the suggested scheme for linking Loughborough and Ilkeston. They felt this the more deeply, as no alternative scheme had been proffered. He also felt that the District Association ought to have someone on the executive of the B. and F.U.A. who knew thoroughly the existing needs of the district.

The Rev. E. W. LUMMIS, in seconding this, alluded to the same subject, saying they were battering against a steel door. The B. and F.U.A. had replied simply with a non possumus. He hoped that by some declaratory act, or some other means, the Association might abandon a doctrinal basis, and so become in the true sense representative of the free churches.

Mr. J. C. WARREN defended the B. and F.U.A., and said that he did not think the President's criticism justified or quite fair.

The reports were then adopted.

The officers elected for the year were:—Mr. J. Harrop White, president; Messrs. Clephan, J. C. Warren, and Franklin Winser, vice-presidents; Mr. B. Dowson, hon. treasurer; Dr. J. F. Blurton, auditor; and the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, hon. secretary.

THE CHURCH AND SOCIAL PROBLEMS.

At the afternoon sitting a paper was read by Miss GITTINS, of Leicester, on "Our Church and Social Problems." The High Church party, she said, at the one end of the ladder, and the Salvation Army at the other, were attacking some of the social evils with zeal, and were both beginning to be recognised as more successful than the others up to a certain point. The Free Church Council now had issued its circular, and its author, Dr. Paton, of Nottingham, said it was written to affirm the social redemptive mission of the evangelical Free Churches of England, and to make practical suggestions as to how the work might be done. There was a way out and the world was finding it out—the world, not the Church, which was being left high and dry. The part of the Church was the recognition of the law of social evolution, and its acceptance with sympathy, and with a great desire to strengthen the forces which were working on its behalf. The working classes were waiting a sign that the churches were recognising their legitimate aspirations, and until they had that there was no wonder that they did not flock into the churches. There was a time when the Unitarian Church stood pre-eminent in the advocacy of "civil and religious liberty all the world over," and could not they again stand before the world as the champions of the great ideal—the reconstruction of society on the lines of justice, freedom, and love? The call to their Church was to lead other churches in keeping abreast of the advancing thought of the age in social matters.

In the course of the discussion which followed, the Rev. CHARLES PEACH, Manchester, thought that one of the reasons that the Unitarian Church was not so prominently before the public was that they recognised that citizenship was one of the primary responsibilities, and men gave to the public services what in other denominations would have been given to sectarian interests. He was convinced that there was no organisation equal to the task, except that which covered all their institutions, and the problem would only be solved by civic and Parliamentary activity.

Messrs. J. W. Belfield, Halstead, C. A. Smith, the Revs. E. S. Lang Buckland, and E. W. Lummis, and the Chairman also spoke.

DR. HUNTER'S SERMON.

The High Pavement Chapel was filled in the evening, when the Rev. John Hunter, D.D., preached a powerful sermon on "The Coming Church: A plea for a Church simply Christian." Dr. Hunter took as his text St. Paul's words, "Is Christ divided?" The word Church, he said, was so often the synonym for disunion, instead of union, that they needed to consider what a Church should be. A return to the simplicity of Christ, if honestly attempted, would put an end to sectarian strife by abolishing that on which sectarianism rested, and would be the signal for such a reformation and advance as the world had never seen. The sympathies of Christ were universal. Around him was much bitterness and intolerance, but in the circle of his influence everything was large and free. In his eye all men were sons of God—that was the foundation on which he built his religion. His charity embraced all races and classes, aliens from the commonwealth of Israel and schismatics, and therefore his followers should be drawn together into a society—a Church. Christ's work began with the single soul, but it did not end there. Again and again he rebuked his disciples for their intolerance and narrowness: "Ye know not what spirit ye are of"; and again, "Whosoever is not against me is for me." To be exclusive was the mark of the Pharisee. Any particular form of organisation could not be regarded as of the essence of the Church of Christ, for it was difficult to get out of the New Testament any other conception of that Church than a company of disciples gathered together in Christ's name and in sympathy with him. For rules he gave principles, for outward authority an indwelling spirit, and his priesthood was a natural one of spiritual power and character. To nothing did Jesus seem more indifferent than theory, and to honour the Father was to honour him. In the parables he showed that the service of man was his spirit, and the judgment of which he spoke knew nothing of creed or ritual. The Church of Christ was just that part of mankind which was baptized in the spirit of Christ, inspired with his redemptive purposes. It was called out of the world to serve the world; it was not the Kingdom, but existed to help to make the Kingdom come, to elevate the life of man, and its end was a civilisation truly and completely Christian. The idea of Christianity had never yet been even approximately realised. The Church had been called the bane of Christianity; and, indeed, in some of its aspects it seemed anything but divine. The passions which crucified Christ still put him to an open shame. Men had often been compelled to be anti-ecclesiastical in order not to be anti-Christian. To find the Church of Christ they must pursue less the historical than the ideal track—truth, beauty, love, the home, the State. The Lord's body refused to be identified with any one organisation, though something of it might be discerned in all. The Church of Christ had yet to be seen, but its presence was inevitable. It must grow out of the churches of to-day: Organised Christianity was on the eve of a reformation far more extensive and spiritual than that of the 16th century, for serious minds were everywhere feeling they needed a Church simply Christian. That Church was coming in the breaking down of prejudices, in the lessening importance that was being attached to uniformity of organisation, and in the growing disposition to emphasise the primary agreements rather than the secondary differences. To make essential any other condition for that Church than faith in Christ was the only real heresy and schism. The Church for which he pleaded was one which in its terms of communion was as broad as the Christian life. The Saviour of men was not honoured by attempts to make him the head of particular organisations. Why should the bond which united a man to Christ be insufficient to bind him to his fellow Christians? It was in God and in Christ, and not in theories concerning them, that Christians should come together.

The sermon, which was rapidly spoken with impassioned vigour, took over an hour in delivery, and we understand that it will be published, like Dr. Hunter's recent "Plea for a Worshipful Church," by Messrs. Dent & Co.

At a special meeting of the Committee in the afternoon the Rev. W. G. TARRANT, on behalf of the B. and F.U.A., discussed the various needs of the district, and it was resolved to proceed with the Loughborough and Ilkeston scheme with the approval and support of the B. and F.U.A.

PROFESSOR VON DOBSCHUTZ, whose work, "Christian Life in the Primitive Church," is to be issued in a few days by Messrs. Williams & Norgate, has just succeeded the veteran Professor H. J. Holtzmann in the chair of New Testament Exegesis at Strassburg University. Before his appointment to Strassburg Professor Dobschutz was Professor Extraordinary of New Testament at Jena, where he is now succeeded by Dr. H. Weinel, of Bonn.

THE CHURCHQUAKE IN SCOTLAND.

THE tremors of the churchquake produced by the decision of the House of Lords, in the case of the rival "Free" Churches, are being felt alarmingly all over Scotland. There has not been such a shaking of things ecclesiastical since the Reformation. The Disruption of 1843 was a small matter compared with it. The quake affects a larger number of persons and a greater amount of property. The issues are wider and the problems raised are of a far graver character.

The seriousness of the case is growing, and perplexity regarding it is deepening. It is the main topic of conversation and the chief subject of newspaper correspondence. It has bulked largely in editorial columns and the pages of magazines. It has seized the public mind as nothing else has done. And the end is not yet. Indeed, we are but at the beginning of a commotion which will certainly become more disturbing as it proceeds.

The rival churches do not know where they are. Their representatives have met in conference, but the ultimate has not come in view. The "Free" section has announced its determination to take over the trust as laid upon it by law, and given the other section notice to quit in June next. Temporary arrangements for occupancy of buildings and administration of funds have been discussed, but nothing more. The victorious section has declined to consider a proposal for arbitration at this stage. It wants to use the opportunity opened up to it.

The "United Free" section is feeling very sore, and has threatened stern opposition to its dispossession. Of the two, the "Free" section has certainly shown the calmest dignity. Its official deliverances have been characterised by masterful determination, legal acumen, and strong conservative piety. Its position is extremely bigoted, but it is held with unquestionable sincerity.

The "United Free" has lost its temper over the case. It has railed on the judges, scouted the "Wee Frees," and given itself away in rage. At its origin the Free Church was heady and short-sighted, and the same faults are being shown now. The United Free Church leaders have sounded the wrong note, and raised passions which obscure the essentials.

But meanwhile certain convictions have been brought home to the public conscience. It is evident that the case is not one of the disposal of church property merely. It is that, but it is much more. In that respect, however, the rival churches present an object-lesson to all churches. Through the claims of the rival sections of the Free Church, the whole question of trust property has been raised. And not alone is church property involved in the decision, for all sorts of trust property are affected by the law as interpreted by the Lord Chancellor. He decided that the original foundation or constitution of a church is the basis on which its property is to be held as resting, in the absence of any contrary declaration. Its constitution is an obligation or bond which a church places permanently upon itself. Unless there is an express provision for altering the constitution, or a discretionary power given to trustees, it must be held as continuously determining the use to which the property and means of the church should be put. A constitution is held to be of the nature of a permanent instruction; it may be whatever its framers intend and devise, but, being adopted, it has all the force of a standing decree. By being a religious body, a church is not above the law of trusts. Inasmuch as the original constitution of the Free Church of Scotland was meant to be everlasting, no probability of essential variation in it being contemplated, it must be held as legally binding for all time. That is laid down as the supreme law in the case, and the principle of it cannot be found fault with. With that law in view, a church which foresees the possibility of a change in its constitution will take care to make fitting provision for alteration, and take power to itself to use the means.

And in view of the inevitability of progress, all churches are being made to see that their constitutions must needs make allowance for alteration. A hard and fast constitution will not serve. The call is therefore for the revision of all church constitutions so as to make them provisional, elastic, and progressional. That is the suggestion which science has made to the churches, and now the law advises it.

As constituted originally, the Free Church was Presbyterian and Calvinistic, with a reservation for Establishment. There was no premonition at the outset of a change to Episcopacy or Congregationalism, or even to union with the older sections of dissenting Presbyterians. No provision was made for the modification of its Presbyterianism. It does not seem to have entered into the mind of the founders that any change of Presbyterian polity would be required. Presbytery was priest writ large, a papacy in another form.

Doctrinally, the constitution was as much fixed. It was certainly never contemplated that the Church would become Arminian, or neo-Calvinistic. Nothing was put into the constitution providing for any doctrinal change. What else, then, could the law say when appealed to but that the organisation and property of the Free Church were permanently pledged to Presbybterianism of a particular kind and to Calvinism.

The "Free" section is quite content to hold to the original constitution, and glories in having the law on its side. The "United Free" admits an enlargement of the original constitution, and an interpretation of it in a progressive spirit. That is not in the letter of the constitution, for, as originally formed, the constitution was meant as a close and exclusive one. It is only by the stress of circumstances that the Progressive party has been driven to interpret it so as to cover their departure from it.

By its policy with the reforming men who rose in its own ranks, the Free Church upheld the idea of unalterability, and prosecuted and punished them. Up to a certain point it resisted change. Amongst its first actions was the refusal to license a probationer, Peter Hately Waddell, who had been a leader of the Disruption students, because he sought liberty of conscience regarding the 23rd chapter of the Confession.

Every attempt at a higher interpretation of the Confession, and the introduction of broader thought was suppressed. The date of the first Declaratory Act (1892) marks a change of policy. Ever since then the Church has shown an apologetic attitude regarding reformed thought.

It was the same with the U.P. Church before is union with the Free Church in 1900. Some of its heretics went further than those of the Free Church, and they forced its hand (in 1879) for modification sooner than change was permitted in that Church. The history of the Free Church up to the passing of the Declaratory Act at least warrants the reading of it expressed by the Lord Chancellor.

The apologists of the "United Free Church" have twitted the learned Judge with ignorance of its history, but they have carefully kept out of view the persistent action of the Church in suppressing variation. They have judiciously left unmentioned the continuous prosecution of heretics on charges of departure from the Standards.

The "United Free Church" has now virtually made a new Confession, and declared itself a progressive body. That is the most important admission which any Presbyterian Church in Scotland has made. By it the U.F.C. has avowedly committed itself to development. In that respect it is radically altered. It is not now the Disruption Church, but one of another character. It is trying hard to make out that it was always progressive and held its Standards tentatively. But the pretence of original openness cannot hold against facts. It is doubly inconsistent, first with its own action in maintaining its Standards against all internal attempts at modification, and, secondly, with its present requirement of subscription. How the Church can be really open to change its thought when it has a Confession still bound upon it is a condition hard to understand. The fact is, the Church is in an anomalous position out of which it cannot possibly emerge except by casting off its dogmatic bonds.

The Churchquake has made it evident that Calvinism is now relegated to the Highlands and Islands. The U.F.C. has repudiated it rather contemptuously, it speaks of the body holding to the Confession of Faith, in the old way, as "Hyper-Calvinistic." But the F.C. simply accepts the Confession in the form and spirit of its framers. It holds to the old sense of it, and will have no modification. We may respect its fidelity, dogged as it is, though we may not approve of the matter to which it holds. Its members are the lineal descendants of the Covenanters, the genuine Calvinists, the remnant of the Bigots.

The Calvinistic area in Scotland has contracted greatly. It is confined to the part of the country beyond Inverness, and to Gaelic-speaking people mainly. It suits the Celtic clannishness and stubbornness. Some Calvinistic spots are found South of the Ness, but they are few and small. That is a very remarkable fact, and it shows how greatly theologic thought has changed in Scotland.

We may now expect to see the Confession of Faith, if not the Bible, bound in tartan, and the General Assembly of Calvinists wearing kilts!

The doctrinal cleavage is openly admitted. The spokesmen of the U.F.C. have strongly repudiated the hyper-Calvinism, as they call it, of the other section. They have given up the old views of election and predestination and adopted a free Gospel.

The new Confession is worth its cost. The decision which caused it has proved to be an enlightenment. It has shown the rival churches where they stand, made them realise the contents of their own consciences, and brought forth avowals which expose the real state of thought in both bodies. It must be admitted that neither body is in a good condition: The F.C. is reactionary. Its conservatism is sheer bigotry. But the U.F.C. is even more unsatisfactory. It is still weighted with the Confession of Faith, dubiously qualified by allowances of free interpretation. It is therefore a Creed-bound Church, with restrictions on the thought of its office-bearers and members. Its Declaratory Acts are held not to touch the substance of the faith expressed in the Confession. Where then is the freedom? What more right has the U.F.C. to preach "a free Gospel" than the F.C.? Suppose another William Knight or Prof. Robertson Smith were to appear in it, what would it do with him? It boasts of spiritual independence, but it is not independent of its own Standards. These are the measure of its freedom. By them it still restricts its thought, though it wears the title "Free."

The situation is extraordinary, and will lead to strange developments. The crisis of property possession will come in June next. Therefore there may be civil war and interminable litigation. What the doctrinal issue may be is hardly predictable.

Meanwhile the Churches which are not Creed bound have a fitting opportunity for bearing willing witness to the principles and methods of real spiritual freedom. While the whirlwind, the fire, and the earthquake proceed, they may well venture the still small voice for true liberty and healthy development.

ALEX. WEBSTER.

Aberdeen, October 15, 1904.

P.S.—The news has come that negotiations have been broken off between the representatives of the rival Churches. Another Ten Years' Conflict has thus begun which will be more bitter and damaging than the last.

WHEN we begin to love like Jesus, we begin to cease from sin; when we arrive at a love like his, sin will be impossible.—Stopford Brooke.

PROFESSOR HENRY JONES, of Glasgow, is giving a course of public lectures this term at Manchester College, Oxford, as Dunkin lecturer in Sociology. His subject is "Working Hypotheses of the Science of Social Life." The lectures, which are to be given on alternate Fridays (at 5 p.m.) and Saturdays (at noon), begin on Friday next, October 28.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Blackpool (Welcome Meeting). — On Wednesday evening, October 12, a meeting was held at the Unitarian Free Church, Dickson-road (North Shore), to welcome the Rev. Robert McGee, the newly-appointed minister. After tea the chiar was taken by Mr. J. Chew, who, on behalf of the congregation, extended a very cordial welcome to Mr. and Mrs. McGee. The Rev. T. Leyland spoke on behalf of the Sunday-school, and the Rev. R. T. Herford on behalf of the North East Lancashire Mission, with a reference to the splendid work Mr. McGee had done at Colne. This was endorsed by Mr. H. Hartley, of Colne, and the Rev. G. O. Bainton (Congregationalist) joined in the welcome on behalf of the other Nonconformist churches of the town. He said that he did not see why Unitarians should not be included in the Free Church Council, for they were all fighting the battle of righteousness, and working for the same God. He expressed his willingness, if asked, to exchange pulpits with Mr. McGee. The Revs. J. M. Mills, of Bootle, the Rev. A. A. Charlesworth, Alderman T. Holt, of Bury, Mr. C. C. Grundy, and two other neighbouring ministers of other communions, also joined in the welcome, and Mr. McGee then spoke in response. Acknowledging their great kindness, he expressed surprise and gladness at the words of welcome from the other ministers in the town. He trusted they would all find in him a brother in every sense of the word. He should try to reciprocate the good feelings which had been expressed in his behalf, and he hoped to do good for the churches of the town generally. He sincerely trusted that the kindly relations cemented that night would be productive of mutual good, and that by their earnest co-operation the Church might long be maintained as a quiet, strong influence and witness for righteousness and truth.

Bolton: Unity Church,—A series of special Sunday evening sermons on "The Unitarian Faith as Jesus taught it," has been given to very large congregations by the Rev. Wilfred Harris, and afternoon addresses have been given by Mr. Joseph Entwistle, that on Oct. 2 being on "Toryism v. Christianity," and on Oct. 16, on "Did Jesus claim to be God?" when the church was crowded to the doors. Great interest has been awakened, and a large amount of wholesome literature distributed. Mr. Harris's second sermon, on "What did Jesus do to be saved?" is to be immediately published.

Bridgwater (Welcome Meeting).—On Friday, October 14, a tea and social meeting were held in the Y.M.C.A. Hall to welcome Rev. R. and Mrs. Davis on their coming to Bridgwater from Evesham. Eighty were present at tea, and others came in later. The informality of the meeting added to its pleasantness. There was no platform, those present gathering in groups and moving about to meet their friends, while the speakers rose where they happened to be when called upon by the chairman, Mr. C. Badger. Besides members of the Bridgwater congregation and their friends, a party of ten or twelve came over from Taunton, and added to the pleasure of the meeting by contributing vocal and instrumental music between the speeches. The following ministers of Churches belonging to the Western Union were also present:—Revs. A. Amey (Colyton), H. Austin (Cirencester), A. N. Blatchford, Secretary to the Union (Bristol), F. A. Homer (Taunton), A. Lancaster (Moretonhampstead), J. Wain (Trowbridge); apologies being announced from ten others. The chairman, in opening the proceedings, offered Mr. Davis a hearty welcome in the name of the congregation, and Mr. H. M. B. Ker supported. The ministers of the district then expressed their good wishes to the Bridgwater congregation and their minister, and Mr. Davis responded, saying that in combining the ministry in Bridgwater with the office of District Minister to the Western Union, he did not feel he owed a divided, but a double allegiance; it was quite possible to serve two masters if they were of the same mind, as he felt sure the Union and the congregation were. The chairman then proposed, and Miss Spiller seconded, a hearty vote of thanks to the Taunton friends for their kindness in coming over and helping with music, and Mr. G. Philpott responded.

Carlisle.—The anniversary of the Viaduct Church was celebrated on Sunday and Monday. The Rev. Ch. V. Mills, of Kendal, was the special preacher or Sunday, and the attendance, especially in the evening, was more satisfactory. On Monday, a public tea meeting was held, when over a hundred persons sat down. In view of the fact that the church is at present without a minister, the usual public meeting was not held, a conversazione being substituted. Votes of thanks to all helpers brought a very pleasant evening to a close.

Chatham.—A series of lectures is being given at Hamond Hill Church on Wednesday evenings by the Rev. J. Tyssul Davis, on Tennyson's "Idylls of the King." The lecturer is dealing with the sources whence the poet drew his material, the interpretation of the poems, their relation to the thought of the time in which they were written. Selections are read by some of the literary students present, of whom nearly half consist of strangers. At the first three lectures the chair was taken by Mr. Mackay, editor and proprietor of the Observer, Mr. Paul Mathews, of the Rochester Grammar School, and Miss Stigant, one of the prominent workers at the neighbouring Presbyterian Church. Favourable notices appear in the local press.

Leeds: Holbeck.—The young women of the Sunday-school, under the direction of their teachers, have held a successful social meeting, attended by 120 friends, as a result of which the committee will be able to hand £5 to the Sunday-shool stall of the forthcoming bazaar.

London Guilds' Union.—The autumn meeting of the London Guilds' Union was held at Essex Church on Wednesday evening, Oct. 12, and was well attended. The proceedings commenced with a service in the church, conducted by the Rev. F. Hankinson, the sermon being preached by the Rev. F. K. Freeston from the words: "For Jesus Christ was not Yea and Nay, but in him was Yea." Many, he said, were brought up to learn to say No! The world was full of temptations and pitfalls, and it behoved us always to be on our guard against evil. In childhood we were taught to resist, to keep watch over ourselves. The ten commandments all begin with "Thou shalt not." But we cannot live on protests, agitations, and negations. We do not want to be known only as exponents of a negative doctrine. Life is not only a battle against sin, it is the building up of that which is the greatest, best, and purest in our nature. It is true there are many pitfalls and snares, but the world is full of glorious things, hopes, opportunities, possibilities, means of service and of joy. We must not only avoid, denounce and protest, but we must believe, love and serve. We must not only hold ourselves in, but must let ourselves go. Faith, hope and love we must have, and love above all. Love is greater than the ten commandments. "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, and thy neighbour as thyself." The best way to conquer the sin and wrong in the world is to love the right and do the right. At the close of service tea was served in the schoolroom, followed by a conference. The Rev. F. K. Freeston occupied the chair, and the Rev. Joseph Wood, of Birmingham, gave an address on "Some practical suggestions for our London guilds gained from experience of the Young People's Religious Unions in America." Our American cousins, he said, have the same object as the basis of their Unions as we have in our Guilds, to provide a means whereby the elder scholars of the Sunday-school may graduate into the Church. The Unions aim at the development of the religious life of the young people by holding devotional meetings on Sunday evenings. As it is the custom in America to hold service only once on the Sunday, and that usually in the morning, the Sunday evening devotional service of the young people does not interfere with the ordinary public worship of the church. Study classes are held during the week, by means of which the intellectual life is developed. In these classes a large number of subjects are treated, science and biography in particular. The theological classes are not so well attended as the others, for the Americans are more interested in practical religion than in theology. Another interesting feature of the work of the Union is the training of the young people for social service. This is done by lectures and conferences held on such subjects as "Political Economy," "Charity," and "Citizenship." The Guild is a kind of technical school for social service. The young people are trained to look upon social service as part of the ordinary duty of life. There is little or no "leisure" in American life. Their intensity is carried into the work and life of the Guild movement. They are not so afraid of union, organisation for a definite object, co-operation, as we are in England. There are 141 societies connected with the Young People's Religious Union. These guilds have a central office, with its paid secretary. One of the principal duties of this secretary is to act as a missionary agent to found new societies up and down the country. Every year the Union takes charge of some struggling church, and helps it over its financial difficulties by making a grant in accordance with its need. The Guild is not a church within a church, but it is an institution which exists for the purpose of helping the young people to pass from the Sunday-school into Church membership. The need of the Guild movement in England is more life, and fuller. The Rev. F. K. Freeston, Mr. A. Thompson, and the Rev. W. H. Rose afterwards spoke. A vote of thanks to Mr. Wood was proposed by Mrs. Bruce, and seconded by Mr. Darby, and carried with enthusiasm. A very pleasant and profitable evening was brought to a close about ten o'clock by the benediction, pronounced by the Rev. J. Wood.

London: Plumstead.—The Tuesday evening lectures continue to be fairly well attended. The Rev. L. Jenkins Jones, J.P., L.C.C., has lectured upon Mr. Robert Blatchford's "God and my Neighbour," and this week Mr. Aylmer Maude lectured to a full house on "Leo Tolstoy." Next Tuesday Mr. Jones is to lecture on Dr. Martineau's "Seat of Authority in Religion," and on Tuesday, November 1, Professor Carpenter commences his course of six lectures on "The Christ of the Creeds and of Experience."

Manchester (Willert-street Mission).—On Sunday week the Rev. J. W. Bishop gave the first of a series of monthly addresses to men, his subject being "God is not the God of the dead, but of the living."

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—The members of the Mutual Improvement Society, attached to the Church of the Divine Unity inaugurated their winter session, on October 13, with a lecture by the Rev. Frank Walters, President of the Society, on Shakespeare's "Tempest." Councillor Affleck, J.P., took the chair, and the attendance—the largest of the twenty years during which Mr. Walters has presided over the class—gave proof of the interest the younger members of his congregation take in their Society. A capital programme for the Session has been arranged.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel.—The Rev. C. J. Street has just been giving a course of three lectures in Channing Hall by way of illustration of his recent holiday in Hungary. The meetings have been largely attended. Collections were made on each occasion, the proceeds being sent to our Hungarian Unitarian brethren in aid of the erection of two new churches—one at Hodmëzo Vásárhely, a town of 60,000 inhabitants in the Great Hungarian Plain, the other at Székely-Udvarhely, a town of 15,000 inhabitants in the heart of the Unitarian village congregations of Transylvania. The first lecture, on Monday, 3rd inst., was entitled "To Vienna and Back," and was illustrated by lantern views. The second, on Monday, 10th inst., was of a historical nature, the subject being "The Hungarian Struggle for Independence." This was illustrated by national music, both vocal and instrumental, kindly given by Mr. and Mrs. W. R. Stevenson and Mr. H. B. Griffiths. A notable feature of this meeting was the fact that the vote of thanks was proposed by Mr. John Figorski, a member of the congregation, who fought for the Hungarians as one of the Polish Legion in 1848 and 1849, and seconded by Mr. Simeon Rejowski, another member of the Polish Legion, who recounted some graphic experiences. The third lecture was delivered on Thursday, 13th inst., the subject being "Among the Hungarian Unitarians." For this lecture a good set of lantern slides, mostly lent by the kindness of the Rev. T. P. Spedding, was displayed. These meetings have been most interesting, and have strengthened the bond of union between the Sheffield Unitarians and their brethren in the distant land of the East.

Whitby.—Having for six years and a half discontinued the name "Unitarian," the minister and congregation of Flower-gate Old Chapel have disconnected themselves from the Yorkshire Unitarian Union.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE appeal of the London District Unitarian Society for £7,500 to help in the building of churches, urgently needed at Kilburn, Lewisham, and Plumstead, will be found advertised on our back page. The appeal has the warm support of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and we trust that it will meet with the most liberal response.

The Rev. Charles Hargrove, having completed his mission to Australasia, as representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, was to sail from Auckland, as we have already announced, on October 14, for San Francisco, where he is due on Monday next. Another of Mr. Hargrove's letters "en route" dated Dunedin, September 20, we shall publish next week.

THE REV. SILAS FARRINGTON concludes to-morrow (Sunday) his ministry at the Ormond-road Free Church, Richmond, and at the same time, after fifty years of active service in America and in this country, will claim his well-earned rest. Born in 1830, in Boston, Mass, not quite a month later than Brooke Hereford, Mr. Farrington held three successive pastorates in America, and then, from 1872 until October, 1889, was minister of the Upper Brook-street Free Church, in Manchester. In that autumn he came to Richmond, ministering first at Channing Hall, and since 1896 in the present church in Ormond-road, the building of which is a permanent memorial of the fruitfulness of his ministry. During their residence of fifteen years Mr. and Mrs. Farrington have struck deep roots at Richmond, and, though they may be absent during the coming winter, we understand that The Knoll in Ormond-road will remain their home. Long may it remain so, in the quiet of their evening time, to the joy of many friends!

THE disgraceful outrage upon the harmless fishing fleet from Hull, which was busily at work last Saturday morning off the Dogger-bank, and was deliberately bombarded for twenty minutes by the Baltic squadron of the Russian fleet, has filled the world with amazement and the people of England with hot indignation. The Tsar has expressed his personal regret to the King, but up to the time of writing no adequate explanation or acknowledgment of the wrong done has been received from Russia. We need not comment further upon the incident at this moment, except to express the profoundest sympathy with the sufferers from the outrage, and the earnest hope that the Russian Government will take the only course in this matter open to a civilised and honourable nation.

M. COMBES obtained a substantial majority in the French Chamber last Saturday evening, 325 votes against 237 sustaining him in his determination to resist the encroachments of the Vatican, and to carry through the separation of Church and State in France.

THE Archbishop of Canterbury reached Liverpool last Saturday, on his return from America. The Christian Register of October 13 has the following editorial note on a Boston incident of the visit:—

That the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Primate of the Anglican Church, should speak in Faneuil Hall in Boston at the call of many citizens, prominent among whom were Unitarians, and that the proceedings began with an address by an eminent Unitarian, the president of Harvard University, and that the reception should be in all respects and without qualification sincere and hearty, marks a date worthy to be remembered in the calendar of the world's history, as really more significant than the Episcopal General Convention, the Peace Congress, or even the National Political Conventions of the year. In a State, of which the governor is a Methodist, in a city of which the mayor is a Catholic, in a hall in which the echoes of rebellion against the union of Church and State have scarcely died away, that such a meeting is possible means much for civil and religious liberty the world over. Such an event has never occurred before in England or America, and will be regarded with wonder on the other side of the world, where such things are not yet possible. The moral of the occasion as drawn by President Eliot he expressed in these words: "We have heard here in Massachusetts and taken to heart, and put into practice, the greatest lesson of the last four centuries—the lesson of religious tolerance."

Dr. John Watson (Ian Maclaren) announced last Sunday to his congregation, in the Sefton Park Presbyterian Church, Liverpool, that next September, having completed a ministry of twenty-five years with them, he should resign the charge. This decision is understood to be final. In his statement Dr. Watson said:—

It would be a calamity to the Presbyterian Church, and it would be a loss to the civic life of Liverpool, if this church were allowed to decay and wither from the top downwards. The work of a city minister in our day is very heavy, and his professional life cannot be as long as that of his fathers, and the burden of work with the increase of years has grown too heavy for me. A quarter of a century is a long time through which to preach to such a congregation as gathers within these walls, and to carry on an organisation so large as ours, as well as to take a not inconsiderable share of public duty. The burden is rapidly becoming too heavy, and I therefore felt it my duty to intimate to my colleagues the conclusion at which I had arrived, and I think it right to make it known to the congregation.

Dr. Watson will be fifty-four next Thursday, and is now about to take exactly the same step taken just fifty years ago by the late John Hamilton Thom, as minister of the Renshaw-street Congregation, when he was only forty-six. But, after a three years' rest, Mr. Thom returned to his congregation, for another ten years of most fruitful ministry. Dr. Watson will perhaps devote himself more exclusively to that literary work by which he has gained so wide a popularity. His departure from Liverpool will be felt as a grievous loss to his church and the city.

The Congregationalists of London find at once a great opportunity and a serious difficulty in the largest of their metropolitan chapels, at Westminster. The new double ministry commencing there represents a rather different motive to Claremont, which has close affinities with the Settlements, or Whitefield's, a great "institutional" church. Its work is summed up as evangelism and teaching. A weekly series of Bible lectures are to be widely advertised with a view of gathering workers from all parts of London. The Pleasant Sunday Afternoon—the "Men's Own" as it has been known at Westminster—is to be retained, but altered in character, and in the direction of making it an opportunity for consecutive and organised educational influence, beginning with a series of lectures on the Sermon on the Mount. Every experiment with these derelict churches, in the midst of a population unhealthily large and crowded, contains instruction for those interested in the problem why the people are outside the churches.

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LONDON AND SOUTH-EASTERN COUNTIES.

ANNUAL MEETINGS.

THE sixteenth annual meeting of the Provincial Assembly of Non-subscribing Ministers and Congregations of London and the South-Eastern Counties was held at Newbury on Wednesday, Oct. 19. The quaint old chapel was a delightful place of meeting, and it was manifest, from the presence of the Mayor at the luncheon and evening meeting, and the speeches of two Nonconformist ministers of other denominations, to which we referred in our note last week, how beneficent has been the ministry of the Rev. Ephraim Turland in the promotion of good feeling in the town, and a truly Christian spirit. The meetings were well attended, the official record of the attendance of ministers, officers, and delegates numbering about seventy, and many other friends being present.

THE ANNUAL SERMON.

The morning service was conducted by the Rev. Henry Gow, of Hampstead, who read as lessons Isaiah lviii. and 1 Cor. iii., and the sermon was preached by the Rev. S. Gardner Preston, of Hastings. The text was from Ephes. v. 25—27, "Christ loved the Church and gave himself up for it; that he might sanctify it, : : : a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish."

He was not there, he said, to speak smooth things. They were inheritors of the gospel of Jesus Christ; their message approached more nearly than many others to the spirit of Christ, and yet their churches did not make headway. Why, with a gospel fitted to appeal to all, to brighten the lives of all, did not their message reach home? It was said, indeed, that Unitarianism was permeating the churches, and he himself held that ultimately there would be only two churches in the land, the Roman Catholic and the Unitarian, the one appealing to the authority of the Church, the other to the authority within; yet he was not content that they as a religious body should have such poor success. The object of the church was to cultivate the spiritual part of man, to deepen and intensify his relations with God, his responsibility to God, to develop all that is true and honourable, strong and beautiful, and make men such that people would look to them for guidance. A true church was a union of men and women bound together by a strong and binding principle, that of serving God through serving their fellow-men, and seeking to develop the divine within. It was sympathy that bound men together, and he wished that the monetary basis of church fellowship might once for all be done away. The only basis should be the desire to help and serve God, the willingness to make sacrifices. Where that was present there would be no difficulty about money matters. As to name, there was none other for them but that of Free Church. He did not think any other church in the land was free as theirs was—free as Christ's kingdom is free. As to officers, he would abolish committees, and have deacons and deaconesses, and the minister ought to be recognised as the real leader of the church. He thought one of the causes of their failure was that they did not put the minister in his right place as the representative of the church and its leader. Another was that they had not held as closely as they ought to the true tradition of preaching. The minister must preach the gospel, and not make his chapel a lecture-hall. People came to the house of God for rest, for inspiration, and strength, and uplifting. In their own great preachers, in James Martineau, Charles Beard, and Hamilton Thom, they could see how that end was fulfilled. If they remembered it, they would make a stronger appeal to the people. They needed a keener sense of responsibility for the church, more energy and courage, and determination to help forward the cause dear to them all. He appealed to his hearers to consecrate themselves anew on the altar of self-sacrifice, and there would come to them a fresh access of power, and God would acknowledge their work.

The collection for the funds of the Association amounted to £8 7s. 7½d., and at the conclusion of the service there was luncheon in the Oddfellows' Hall, over which the Mayor, Mr. E. Lewendon, J.P., genially presided. After lunch he proposed the toasts of the King and the Provincial Assembly, to which latter the Rev. J. Edwin Odgers responded. The Rev. E. H. Titchmarsh, Congregational minister, and the Rev. F. Halliday, Wesleyan, in response to a word of welcome from the Rev. E. Turland, made cordial speeches of fellowship and good wishes.

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

The President, the Rev. F. K. FREESTON, took the chair at the afternoon business meeting in the chapel, and after the roll-call and the invitation to ministers newly settled in the Province (the Revs. R. C. Dendy, L. P. Jacks, and W. J. Jupp), to join the Assembly, expressed great regret at the absence through illness of their Treasurer, Mr. John Harrison, to whom they were indebted for so much generous help. A resolution of sympathy and grateful acknowledgment, moved by the Rev. A. J. Marchant, seconded by the Rev. W. H. Rose and supported by the Rev. J. Harwood, who was charged with a personal message from Mr. Harrison to the Assembly, and by the Rev. F. Allen, was unanimously passed.

The accounts and reports, which had been previously printed, were taken as read.

The Reports.

The Committee's report chronicled a fair amount of good and useful work, and recorded considerable additions to the Ministers' Auxiliary Pension Fund, including handsome donations from Sir John Brunner and Mr. G. W. Chitty. Reference was made to the death of the Revs. Dr. Brooke Herford and J. Remington Wilson, to the coming retirement of the Rev. S. Farrington, and various ministerial changes in the provinces, a cordial welcome being offered to the new comers.

The report of the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, the minister-at-large, gave particulars of his steady faithful work, and referred to two helpful conferences of lay preachers. He strongly urged that the work must go forward, if it was not to go back.

There were reports also from the Postal Mission by Lady Wilson, and of the S.S. Union by the Rev. F. Allen.

The Rev. T. E. M. EDWARDS, called upon by the President, spoke of what Mr. Remington Wilson had done for Canterbury, and said that an arrangement had been made by which Deal and Canterbury would now be linked together under one ministry. The reports were not very encouraging, and he thought the churches were sharing the general depression of the country. They should ask whether there was not, perhaps, some flaw in their churches, whether they touched, as they should, the real interests of the people. He thought they needed more spiritual activity and that it would be well for minister and congregation to confer together occasionally, every three or six months, not merely on business matters, but on all that concerns the life of their church. They must use every means for the intellectual and spiritual advancement of the people.

The Rev. JAMES HARWOOD presented the report of the Advisory Committee. There had been two applications during the year for admission to the ministry, one of which had been withdrawn, and in the other case the usual certificate had been granted. He wished it to be clearly understood that the Committee was ready, on request, to advise any congregation, ministers, officers, or trustees, on matters affecting the interests of the churches, or, in case of disputes, at the request of both parties, to act as arbitrators, or to appoint an arbitrator. He expressed their great regret that Mr. Frederick Nettlefold felt obliged, by the state of his health, to withdraw from that committee, which was originally appointed, on his motion, in 1891, and on which he had served for so long. They were thankful to know that Mr. Nettlefold was regaining his strength, and hoped that for many years they might enjoy the privilege of his sympathy and counsel.

On the motion of the Rev. W. G. TARRANT, seconded by the Rev. F. W. STANLEY, a resolution was unanimously passed, expressing regret that Mr. Nettlefold felt obliged to retire from the Advisory Committee, and sending to him as an old friend and first President of the Assembly a word of greeting and an expression of gratitude.

On the report on Public Questions, the greater part of which was published in these columns last week, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant asked whether the condition of South Africa had been considered, and the Rev. S. S. Brettell expressed regret that the subject of Vivisection had again been passed over, contrary to the undertaking given, he understood, at the last annual meeting.

The PRESIDENT then moved the adoption of the reports and accounts. He welcomed the delegates, and impressed it upon them that the success of those meetings largely depended on the seriousness with which they regarded their duties, as representing the churches of the Province. Having referred to the losses of the year, and various ministerial changes, he spoke of the offer of special preachers made to congregations, to which there had not been much response, and to the usefulness they had hoped for the Assembly Messenger. That monthly organ would be continued until the end of the year, and then the committee must consider whether the response was sufficient for it to be retained. They had a duty to their young people, to let them know the history and traditions of their churches. By literature and lectures they must let them know the thrilling story, illustrated in lives and in buildings such as that old chapel in which they were met. To make the history of to-day they must understand the history of the past A noble example they had in the Rev. Benjamin Woodbridge, the ejected of Newbury, and founder of that congregation, of whom Calamy said: "He suffered many things for his Nonconformity, but was generally respected by men of temper and judges of real worth. : : : He was a man of great generosity and of an exemplary moderation; addicted to no party, but of a catholic spirit." So, the President concluded, they also wished to help on the cause of true religion, and they wished to do it in a truly catholic spirit.

The Rev. F. T. REED seconded the motion, urging that the lectures at Sevenoaks should be continued, and it was adopted.

Mr. W. W. Bruce, L.C.C., was then elected President, and the other officers were re-elected. The Committee and S.S. Correspondents and Public Questions Committee were appointed. As the Advisory Committee, the President and Mr. W. Arthur Sharpe, with the Revs. W. Copeland Bowie and James Harwood, were appointed.

An invitation to the Assembly to meet next year at Unity Church, Islington, was cordially accepted. The Rev. Henry Gow was elected preacher, and the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor supporter.

A welcome was then offered to the representatives of kindred societies, to which the following responded:—The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie (B. and F.U.A.), Mr. David Martineau (L.D.U.S.), the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth (G.B.A.), the Rev. W. G. Tarrant (S.S.A.), and Miss Tagart (Central Postal Mission).

On the motion of Mr. E. WILKES SMITH, seconded by Dr. C. A. GREAVES, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:—

That in the opinion of this meeting of the Provincial Assembly of London and the South-Eastern Counties,

(a) War is a relic of the barbaric state, and should never be entered upon by civilised peoples, while other means are open to settle differences between nations.

(b) It is opposed to the whole spirit of Christianity, degrading to humanity, and the source from which springs a vast number of civic ills.

(c) This Assembly is horrified at the dreadful scenes which have taken place in the Far East, and calls upon its members to do everything in their power to further the cause of peace.

This was an amended form of the resolution, of which notice had been given, a clause appealing to the Government being objected to by the Rev. S. G. Preston and by the Rev. H. Gow, who said that what they wanted was simply to express their detestation of war. The mover of the resolution accepted the amendment, and the meeting terminated.

THE PUBLIC MEETING.

In the evening a public meeting was held in the Oddfellows Hall, the Mayor of Newbury presiding

The Rev. W. G. TARRANT was the first speaker. He referred to the great benefit conferred by the Assembly on the scattered congregations of the Province, and by the Auxiliary Pension Fund on their ministers. In that Assembly they gathered together, and got to know one another; the spirit of life and mutual sympathy and help was abroad. That was a very practical result. It was true they had disadvantages in their churches, but compensations far more. To have no definite creed was in some ways a disadvantage, until they saw what those churches suffered which had a binding creed from which they had departed. Their standard was the right and the duty of private judgment. That led to a real religious life. It was true they were not many, but there were compensating disadvantages in a great crowd. A few sincere, intelligent minds were a challenge to thoroughness and sincerity, a crowd tempted the preacher to win a moment's applause. Their faith was in the present Divinity, ever carrying on the beautiful, beneficent creation, not only in the things of nature, but in human nature, the indwelling God making Himself known in every heart. For that faith they could not be too grateful. It inspired them to speak their word in all simplicity and love. Of Jesus Christ they thought as one who came, as all the sons of God came, to spread the divine life more and more in his brethren; and of revelation their thought was that in heathen, as in Christian lands, God had not left Himself without a witness. That great faith, a living spirit in their hearts, encouraged them to go to all, for the healing of all divisions. It was good to hear those words from their brethren of other faiths earlier in the day. Those were signs that the old bad days of bigotry were receding, that evil was lessening, and they might take that day's proceedings as a token from the Giver of all good that their labour had not been in vain.

THE REV. R. H. U. BLOOR said that while they rejoiced in the peacefulness of the beautiful old chapel in which they had met, they must look for the stimulus of life and activity. In the Gospels he was struck by one constant thought of Jesus, his identification of his Gospel with life and growth. Bishop Wilberforce once said to a company of preachers, "Some men prepare sermons, other men prepare themselves." In such meetings as that they did best, perhaps, to prepare themselves, to encourage one another, to gain belief in the life around them, and the hope of doing something for others. Ministers and congregations alike must help one another. Their need was not criticism, but mutual sympathy. So they would come to feel that, though few in number, they had a real work to do.

The Rev. HENRY GOW said that he wished they had expressed more fully at the business meeting the gratitude they in that Assembly owed to the Rev. F. K. Freeston for his services as President. He had been deeply impressed by the ability, the earnestness and love, with which Mr. Freeston had presided over the work; and he had not only thrown himself into the work of the Assembly, but had interested his congregation in it, as witness their splendid collections for the funds, and the succession of Mr. Wallace Bruce to the presidency. Referring to the meetings of that day, and the speeches of the men of other bodies, he said it was a tribute to Mr. Turland's position in the town. A minister in a small country town had special opportunities of getting into touch with all good people engaged in the work of the town, and making himself felt as a real Christian and a man. That Mr. Turland had done. They ought not to be discouraged by small numbers. Phillips Brooks once said to a group of young men at Harvard that the occasion he remembered as most impressive, was not when addressing any of the great assemblies, to which he often spoke, but a little gathering in an obscure mission room in a poor quarter of Boston. He hoped the presence of that Assembly would be helpful to their friends, and encourage the good work they were doing in Newbury.

The Rev. EDGAR DAPLYN, as one who had come as an outsider into that fellowship, spoke of the joy with which they entered into the liberty of those churches, where there was free movement of thought and room to grow, and every man could speak his own convictions of truth. That was what the world wanted, as shown by all the sixpenny theology on the bookstalls. The world was feeling after those things, and looked for a religion that was straight and true. The churches in that Assembly were pledged to a faith that was born of experience, a knowledge of the actual life with God, and they kept an open door for all who would come in.

The Rev. T. E. M. EDWARDS also rejoiced in the freedom of their churches, and pointed to the warning example of Scotland. They had faith in the living truth of God.

The Rev. S. BURROWS bore a similar testimony, and the Rev. E. TURLAND expressed his gratitude for the success of those meetings, and spoke earnestly of the progress of the true spirit of religion in the town. The Rev. F. ALLEN, on behalf of the Assembly, thanked their Newbury friends, and the Mayor, who said it had been a great pleasure to him to be there and take part in the proceedings. The meeting began with a hymn, and closed with the Doxology.

A REVIEW of the Rev. R. Travers Herford's "Christianity in Talmud and Midrash" fills three and a half columns of the Theologische Literatur Zeitung of Oct. 15, a fortnightly paper, edited by Professors Harnack and Schürer. The review, which is by Paul Fiebig, of Wittenberg, opens with a reference to the dedication of the book to the memory of Abraham Kuenen, and adds, "it is worthy of this great master." The review, as the work itself, is chiefly for specialists in an obscure subject, but we may quote its concluding s ntences:—

One could wish that Herford's book might be made more generally available through a translation into German. His reliable and methodical work would certainly do much to awake and make vivid in Germany also the consciousness of the value of Talmudic studies.

A VETERAN'S PRAISE.

PRESENTATION OF MR. S. S. TAYLER'S PORTRAIT.

ON Friday evening, Oct. 21, in the hall of the Working Men's Club and Institute Union, Clerkenwell-road, a meeting was held to do honour to the President of the Union, Mr. Stephen Seward Tayler. To celebrate his eightieth birthday, and in grateful acknowledgment of his devoted services to the Union, extending over more than forty years, since its establishment in 1862 by the late Henry Solly, the members determined to secure a portrait of their President, to be placed side by side with that of his predecessor, Mr. Hodgson Pratt. The portrait, admirably painted by his daughter, Miss Minna Tayler, was unveiled at the meeting on Friday evening, amid the warmest expressions of affection and regard.

The chair was taken by the Vice-President, Mr. J. J. DENT, formerly secretary of the Union, who spoke with great simplicity and gratitude of what he personally owed to Mr. Tayler, and of the unobtrusive but invaluable services he had rendered to the Union as a hard-working member of the executive through all those years.

Mr. B. T. HALL, the present secretary, read a number of letters of regret for inability to be present, and among them one from Mr. Hodgson Pratt, whom Mr. Tayler succeeded in the office of President two years ago, which so fully expressed the feeling of the meeting that we are glad to reproduce it here.

Mr. Hodgson Pratt's Letter.

After expressing his joy that the Club Union was about to honour itself in doing honour to its President, and his deep regret that he could not be present, Mr. Pratt, who wrote from Le Pecq, Seine et Oise, France,, continued :—

"Everybody present will feel proud and happy because there is nothing more delightful in this world than to offer praise where it is deserved. Indeed, it is not every day that we have an opportunity of enjoying this privilege; and it does us all good when we have it. Praise which is sincere does us good because we then feel, more vividly than usual, that there is such a thing as nobility and virtue within reach of us; and that those words are not mere words but have a living existence. Amidst the carping, snarling and backbiting which is too frequent, it is well to be reminded that there are among us great souls, men inspired with the spirit of true brotherhood, seeking ever to make the world better. To know and feel that there are such comrades as these in touch with us —to see and hear them—sweetens our daily life.

"Thus we are very grateful to our old friend for helping us to believe all the more strongly in human goodness because we have so long witnessed it in him, and have enjoyed its results in the progress of our Club Union. It has always seemed to me that there is no flaw in Mr. Tayler's character, and that he is one of those men whom we know thoroughly and instinctively, through his perfect frankness and simplicity of nature. It is not always so, even in the case of men who receive public honours, because we too often find in them something which mars our satisfaction, some trace of self-seeking, of personal vanity, some excessive desire for popularity, place or power. In the present case, however, none of us have ever seen any indication of these defects. On the contrary, we all get the impression of a man who is exceptionally modest and unassuming, and without egotism—of one who cares only for the success of any good cause, which he can help forward.

"We must all feel proud that such a friend as this has been so long and so closely associated with our great and important branch of social reform, from the very beginning of its work until the present hour. We all feel that much of its success as a public institution has been due to his wise counsel and co-operation. He could not have given so much unstinted service to it unless its ideal were noble and beneficent. We are all aware that, in a most remarkable and exceptional degree, he has allowed no personal convenience or comfort to interfere with his constant attention to the affairs of the Union. Think what it must have cost a man of his age to take that long double journey at night between Brixton and Clerkenwell, week after week, month after month, during many years! He has set a great example of unostentatious service to an important Associa'ion, which, by the bye, has often been much misunderstood and misrepresented on platforms and in the press. For obvious reasons it has often required some moral courage to defend the Clubs, and the wisdom of some of us has been sharply called in question in connection therewith.

"Such true and honest service as Mr. Tayler's, moreover, affords a very practical answer to those who assert that whenever men of the middle class associate themselves with the working classes in the promotion of public objects, they do so for the purpose of getting into Parliament, or of reaping some other personal advantage. That is often absolutely false, as in this case, and statements of that kind, made without qualification, only serve to weaken the bonds which should unite all fellow-citizens in efforts to improve the welfare of the community.

"Therefore, for the sake of building up a true and noble democracy—that form of society which is based on equal justice for all alike—the example of such a life as that of our President becomes increasingly necessary.

"When the towns and villages of England shall everywhere be permeated by the spirit and work of such men as he, the proceedings of all public bodies, councils, and boards will grow stronger, sounder and more efficient, because more free from individual selfishness.

"For all these reasons I look upon our friend as one of the pioneers of the good time coming, when hopeless poverty shall cease to dwell in our midst, and when the great majority of our fellow men shall enjoy lives full of hope and brightness."

After the Chairman's address, which dwelt with much feeling on what the Club Union owed to Mr. Tayler, and on his many public services, the portrait was unveiled, amid loud applause, by Mr. William Minet, another staunch friend of the Union, to whose long services as legal adviser a warm tribute was paid.

Mr. MINET, in his address, spoke of the single-hearted devotion with which Mr. Tayler had given himself to that work, the great value of his practical wisdom, his courage and great kindness, which found expression in unfailing tact. In conclusion, he quoted Tennyson's lines as aptly describing their friend :—

> Rich in saving common-sense
> And, as the greatest only are,
> In his simplicity sublime.

After the unveiling of the portrait addresses were given by Mr. Corrie Grant, M.P., Mr. W. H. Dickinson, L.C.C., who spoke especially of Mr. Tayler's services on the London County Council; Mr. Will Steadman, the Mayor of St. Pancras, and the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie. A telegram from Mr. Will Crooks, M.P., who had hoped to be present, was also read.

Mr. CORRIE GRANT recalled a saying of the late Bishop Creighton's, that simplicity of aim and sincerity of character were the possessions most highly to be prized, and said that in Mr. Tayler they saw the truth of those words exemplified. He had outlived many of his contemporaries in that work, but he might have that supreme satisfaction, while he saw the passing away of men, to see the coming of principles.

Mr. TAYLER'S response was entirely characteristic, for while he recalled the memory of their first President, Lord Brougham, and Lord Lyttleton and the Rev. Henry Solly, he said almost nothing about himself. He rejoiced in the progress of the work, the independence it had achieved, the present strength of the Union, with its clubs in every part of the country, and those central buildings (erected by the Union at a cost of £20,000); he laid special stress on the fact that their work was not in the interest of one class alone, but for the common good.

Other speeches followed, with thanks to Mr. Minet and the Chairman, and the meeting, which will be a happy memory to all concerned, was brought to a close.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

"JUBILEE" RECEPTION IN LONDON.

ON Wednesday evening a Reception was given at Essex Hall by Sir Edwin and Lady Durning-Lawrence, to meet a College deputation from Manchester, consisting of Colonel Pilcher, Principal Gordon, the Revs. E. L. H. Thomas (College secretary), C. Peach and T. P. Spedding (secretaries of the Jubilee Memorial Committee).

The attendance at the Reception, though not very large, was widely representative, and much interest was manifested.

During the evening Sir EDWIN DURNING-LAWRENCE took the chair, and cordially welcomed the guests. He expressed deepest interest in the welfare of the College, and specially emphasised the fact that this movement for commemorating its jubilee in the way proposed, by securing an ample residence, originated with past and present alumni, who, in order to give the most substantial proof of their affection for their alma mater and their sense of its need, had denied themselves by sacrifices they could ill afford, and had subscribed £1,000 towards the purchase of the residence. As regards the building and grounds which had been acquired, he could only express his surprise at the excellent bargain that had been made. He hoped that friends would back up the promoters by generous help.

The Rev. W. G. TARRANT, secretary of the Reception Committee, said many sympathetic letters of apology had been received, some with contributions to the fund. Mr. James R. Beard had written to express his keen disappointment at not being able to attend, through severe illness, as one of the deputation. Mr. Beard said the College had been the central interest of his life; as he had seen it develop and strengthen, his desires for its usefulness to Unitarianism had grown with it. He earnestly appealed, at this crisis, to all who cared for our faith, "to strengthen, even by sacrifice, the hands of those who are refounding the Unitarian Home Missionary College." Mr. Tarrant said they would all share his regret at Mr. Beard's enforced absence, and trust that he would soon be restored, and see the successful consummation of his wishes.

Colonel PILCHER said he personally regretted Mr. Beard's absence very much, as it entailed on him the duty of advocating the cause of an institution which no one could have better represented than the son of its founder, Dr. Beard. Still, as one who had been on the committee for thirty-one years, being chairman about half that period, he could amply testify to the earnest religious spirit that marked the work of the ministers educated at the College. He referred to the sketches of the history of the College in Mr. James Beard's Jubilee Address, and the Rev. J. C. Street's sermon, both of which were printed for circulation. From these it was clear that, in spite of obvious difficulties, the College had done remarkably good work. But everyone felt that it was time the worst of those difficulties, such as the defective lodging of the students, should be removed; and in the Hall of Residence they hoped to provide a healthful home, not only for their divinity students, but also for lay-boarders, with whom it would be a good thing on both sides to associate during the years of study. Of the £20,000 needed, the sum of £12,000 was already practically assured; and he warmly urged that no effort should be spared to enable the College to open its new chapter of history free from debt.

Principal GORDON made special reference to the new "Faculty of Theology" at Victoria University, Manchester, in connection with which there were two points of extreme significance. First, no pledges were to be asked of teachers or taught; and, secondly, in framing the examination questions nothing was to be so put as to necessitate the expression of theological opinion. All the chief Protestant bodies in the country, including for this purpose the Anglican Church, had accepted these conditions of working with the Faculty. All kinds of students would thus be found sitting side by side in the pursuit of their theological studies, and they could not but be greatly influenced, and have their sympathies broadened, by this feature in their training. Their own College had eagerly accepted the opportunity offered, and all they now asked was that friends in the country would enable them to have what every other religious body connected with the Faculty had, viz.: room to teach, and a residence of their own. They were truly a Missionary College, their work was the diffusion of a living religion. He knew of no rivalry between themselves and any other College. "Think, and let think" was the motto they commended to the world; "Live, and let live" was all they pleaded to others engaged in similar work. So far as the deputation were concerned, they had no option but to carry forward the challenge of the alumni who had so generously begun the movement for a new residence. The work must go on now, and he commended to all the opportunity to help the brave men who were alike grateful for the past and hopeful for the future of the College.

The Revs. C. PEACH and E. L. H. THOMAS also addressed the meeting, and on the motion of Mr W. A. SHARPE, seconded by the Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE, a cordial vote of thanks was passed to Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence for presiding.

LITERATURE.

THE PROBLEM OF EXISTENCE.*

THE full title of Mr. Mallik's somewhat voluminous work is "The Problem of Existence: Its Mystery, Struggle, and Comfort in the Light of Aryan Wisdom." After reading a title so full of promise, one is a little disappointed to find that the author's intention, as declared in the preface, is only to inquire "whether the virtues preached and practised by great minds in the past cannot be assimilated with what is called by its admirers and devotees practical modern life."

What the book actually contains one discovers in examination to be a kind of modernised exposition of ancient Oriental Aryan thought, drawn largely from the "Vedanta" and its commentaries, and brought to bear on a variety of considerations mostly ethical. The author does his best to weld all together to give one consistent view of life, a view in which the solution of its main problems, even as they present themselves to the modern mind, is to be found. To say the least, the ambition overshoots the attainment. Professor Max Müller has said: "It is particularly difficult to translate the language of Eastern philosohpy into the language of our own philosophy, and to recognise our own problems in their philosophical and religious difficulties" ("Psychological Rel., 102"). This difficulty the author inevitably encounters, and in many connections readers will feel that for them it has not been overcome.

The least satisfactory section is Part I. on "The Mystery of Life." The views of man's nature and his relationship to this world set forth are very inadequate as expositions of Aryan thought. The other two sections on "The Struggle of Life" and "The Comfort of Life" have much more to commend them. Such topics as "Education," "Duty to the State," "Knowledge and Asceticism" are dealt with in a suggestive manner.

The book is full of quotations from the ancient sages, and the parallels of thought culled from Western writers are always interesting. It would be more readable were it more condensed, for continued and long-drawn-out expositions of maxims and precepts are apt to prove wearisome to all but a very select group of readers.

JESUS OF NAZARETH.*

MANY of those who have ceased to regard Jesus as God would feel that it was a ludicrous understatement to say merely that they respected him. Indeed, nothing is more characteristic of our age than the enthusiastic loyalty accorded to the prophet of Galilee by those who have given up the whole apparatus of Christian theology. The object of Mr. Sidney's book is to challenge this feeling of admiration, which he considers exactly as superstitious as the older doctrine. He informs us (p. 5) that in the best interests of his fellow men he will show of Jesus of Nazareth "not only that he was a man and not a divinity, but that in reality he was a man with no claims to our respect." Such a contention had need to be supported by temperate and strong argument. We look in vain for this in the book before us. The author has an unfortunate habit of using texts before he has decided whether he will treat them as genuine or not, and then gaining at once a sneer at the evangelist and an attack on Jesus. Either Jesus did speak of the other sheep which are not of this fold or he did not. If he did, John is not open to the charge of altering the record; if he did not, then the author clearly must not condemn Jesus for what is said on the subject. There is a bold originality in Mr. Sidney's arguments, but it is gained at the expense of what is even more important in an argument, viz., that it shall be a sound one. The passage on the relations of Jesus and John the Baptist is a fair specimen of the author's controversial method. The point to be established is that it was the "theatrical imagination" of Jesus that forced John to wear a garb he would not otherwise have adopted. The proof is as follows:—Dean Farrar asserts that John did not know Jesus; but by the Jewish law every Jew must go to Jerusalem at the Passover; therefore both Jesus and John did do so; therefore Jesus and John were well acquainted with one another; therefore the Dean is wrong, and Jesus did by virtue of his "theatrical imagination" impose his will on John. It is quite unnecessary to point out the non-sequitur. We had noted many other passages, some of them of a needlessly offensive character, but probably enough has been said to show that as the theory is false so the advocacy is not worth serious attention.

* "The Truth about Jesus of Nazareth." By Philip Sidney. 1904. (Stewart & Co. 2s. 6d.)

But this book does suggest a painful and pathetic reflection. Mr. Sidney tells us that he was brought up a member of the Church of England. Behind the pages of this volume we feel a tragedy, a discovery that childhood's faith was based on error, and that accredited religious teachers continue to promulgate as history what is known to be erroneous. Then follows blank disillusion, and a fierce swinging out into revolt. To many minds this discovery cannot but be attended by anger and disdain. Such we gather to be Mr. Sidney's case. And it is right to remember that many of the apologists use the Gospels in a manner at least as ignorant and uncritical as his own. In some sense we may hold orthodoxy responsible for such a natural reaction as we find here. But a book is in no sense justified because its motive is to some extent explained.

SHORT NOTICES.

In Dr. Matheson's Leaves for Quiet Hours we have a book compiled from the well-known meditative pieces contributed by him week by week to the Christian World. There are doubtless many readers of that journal who will be grateful for the opportunity of re-opening some of these "Leaves," and of keeping them at hand for occasional use. Those who meet the author here for the first time will see at a glance that his is a wise and cheery religion; and if his spiritual dialect is not theirs, they may nevertheless easily extract meanings suitable to their own case. The book would be really better if it were not pretentiously and cheaply gilt. (Jas. Clarke & Co. Price 3s. 6d.)

Mr. Coulson Kernahan spoils the effect of his latest theological novelette-pamphlet by recourse to a style of writing which recals a rather famous lady's pages. He can do better than imitate Marie Corelli. The title of his new work is The Face Beyond the Door, and his subject is human immortality. He has presented his arguments and suggestions in the form of a sort of dialogue between a man and an angel; and to one already in sympathy with the belief in immortality, much that he says is admirable and cogent. Besides slipping, however, here and there, into prolix similes that add nothing to the force of his reasoning, and certainly diminish his quality as a writer, he allows himself to use very questionable expedients—as, for example, at the close of the tenth chapter, where the happy parting look of a previously unconscious sufferer is emphasised surely beyond reason. Those who have seen many die have seen many sleep quietly away in unbroken stupor—would Mr. Kernahan accept an argument against immortality if based on that fact? But his worst offences, both as a writer and a debater, are in the closing chapter, though doubtless he meant to be most impressive there. Let him but make the experiment with some candid sceptical friend, he will find, we fear, that his highly imaginative description of Christ's last hours will start more criticism than it allays. We heartily wish the author could have confined his exuberant fancy a little; his intentions are excellent, and some of his work equally so; but we should hesitate to give the booklet to any keen young mind as a prop to falling faith. (Hodder and Stoughton. 2s. cloth.)

We are glad to note the issue of a second edition of The Burden of Engela, the striking poem in which Miss A. M. Buckton embodied her studies of life in the late Dutch Republic of South Africa, and experiences of the war. We are glad to have the opportunity of emphasising our appreciation of the originality and conscientiousness of Miss Buckton's sketches, as well as the imaginative power the poem displays. In reviewing the first edition we pointed out the striking resemblance between the impression produced by the book and the picture of her wanderings given by Mrs. De la Rey. We were unfortunate enough so to express ourselves as to suggest to some minds direct dependence of the English upon the Dutch work, and are glad to have the opportunity of correcting an entirely false presentation. As a matter of fact, we believe that Miss Buckton had never seen Mrs. De la Rey's book. We once more commend the poem to all who desire to cultivate healing and sympathetic relations with our fellow subjects in South Africa. (Methuen and Co.)

V.

I have not yet found a full and satisfying explanation of the saying, "Cast not your pearls before swine." I know the application which is usually made. It found memorable expression in Tract 80, "On Reserve in Communicating Religious Knowledge." The Tract gave great offence. The offence lay in the word "Reserve." It seemed to mean keeping something back. It was in vain that the writer proved what required little proof, that in the Bible there is such reserve, and that the evangelical teaching of the day was painfully unreserved. The obnoxious word was not forgiven. The caution was not unneeded; there is an irreverent, indiscriminate handling of sacred themes which is to be avoided; but it is difficult to believe that he who spoke of these words was only laying down a rule of delicacy in touching religious subjects.

I can find a wider sense which the words will very well bear. Pearls are the constant emblem in Scripture of that which is precious and pure. No one would consciously cast away pearls, and that, perhaps, is the point of the parable. The unthinking do not know the preciousness of spiritual things; they suffer them to be abused and defiled. There are affections which belong properly to their spiritual nature; they throw them away upon lower wants. The lower nature turns upon the higher, and tramples upon that which it can neither value nor understand. The prodigal wastes his substance. What is the life of mean streets but the reckless casting away of pearls—modesty and delicacy of word and deed, and freshness and simplicity of heart? Even in the higher walks of society, that which ought to be of priceless worth—the innocence of youth—is often contaminated by forced familiarity with that which is unwholesome and impure. The wider sense is more satisfying, but who shall say that it was the sense intended?

Some would apply the proverb—for proverb it probably was—to the cheapening of religious privileges; and it must be admitted that to make them easy is almost certainly to make them cheap. The merchant who found goodly pearls without seeking, and made them his own without buying, would soon cease to believe that any pearl could be of great price. "If the prophet had bid thee do some great thing, wouldst thou not have done it?" It is the great things, hard to do, that are thought to be worth doing. The church with a discipline is the church which survives; the church which asks no questions, opens its arms to all comers, and plays down to their convenience, shares the fate of all societies which discover too late that lowered terms are taken as a sign of falling value. The Tractarian Movement, by making religion more difficult, made it more desirable, and taught the lesson that spiritual blessings, to be prized by those who have them not, must be seen to be cherished and guarded by those who have them. But this, again, may not be the meaning which the words, when they were first spoken, were intended to convey.

We must be content, perhaps, with the general idea that there is a holy jealousy which protects holy things, and will not suffer them to be profaned.

A Social Questions Committee has been appointed by the Manchester District Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian Churches. This development of the work of the Association results from a paper read on June 7 by Mr. Richard Robinson on "Our Churches and Social Questions." His paper drew attention to the grave moral and social conditions of life in which large numbers of people live, and urged that strenuous and devoted efforts towards amelioration and the cure of remediable evils was especially the duty of the Christian churches; while the methods most likely to lead to their successful solution are those prompted by the religious spirit of self-sacrifice and love of humanity: that, therefore, our churches should take their share as communities with common responsibilities and discipleship in considering and investigating these questions. The committee is "to consider and investigate the problems of the time as they affect the physical, moral, and spiritual welfare of the community"; and it "may summon special meetings of the members of the churches forming the Association to consider any urgent questions of the nature described," and take such action as the meeting of the church members may determine. It has also power to formulate resolutions upon any urgent questions, to be considered by a special meeting of the Governing Body of the Association. A committee of twenty-three has been appointed, some of whom are not members of the Governing Body. The arrangement by which the committee may call a meeting without waiting for the Governing Body, secures the possibility of prompt action, while it is likely to do something towards awakening keener interest among the churches.

MR. ARMSTRONG'S LECTURES.

UNDER the chairmanship of Dr. Shipman, M.P. for the town, Mr. Armstrong delivered the fourth of his course of lectures on Theism and Agnosticism at Northampton, on Tuesday evening. The audience was so large that the Church had to be used instead of the Lecture Hall. The title of the lecture was "Materialism and Atheism," and the teachers chosen for criticism were John Tyndall and Charles Bradlaugh. Basing his remarks very largely on the celebrated Belfast Address of 1874, the lecturer showed that although Tyndall contended that in matter, and in matter only, was the promise and potency of every form and quality of life, he had himself to admit that consciousness was unexplainable, he could trace no connection between molecular movements and consciousness of action, but consciousness is a very large and important factor in life, and a system which cannot include it in its survey is manifestly far from satisfactory. Tyndall's contention, that we are not to believe that which we cannot "visualise," will not bear much examination. In the very nature of the case, if there be any soul energising and uniting for the time the atoms that seem to us to make man, and if there be any soul behind or within the universe itself, it will be immaterial and incapable of being pictured on material lines; and, as a matter of fact, we do believe in that which we cannot visualize—"force," for instance. A definition of matter as that by which all the processes of nature are brought about, a definition which Tyndall on one occasion put forward, wins the day for materialism only by misusing language. "If you choose so to define matter as to include in it motion, force, power, consciousness, and will, then indeed you can triumphantly demonstrate that your universe is matter, and nothing more." Tyndall was at heart a poet, and was in temperament profoundly religious.

The powerful personality of Charles Bradlaugh and his reforming zeal, rather than the depth of his thought, made him a powerful influence over many minds in the sixties and seventies. Atheism to him meant not so much the denying of God as the denial of the several gods that were to hand, and the carrying on of life and thought without any consideration of the God-idea. Two of Bradlaugh's favourite formulæ when submitted to examination prove themselves misleading. The first, "We cannot believe in that which we cannot define," needs only to be tested by one's own knowledge of many simple experiences — sweetness, cause, time, space, one's-self, &c. The second, "We cannot believe on the ground of the experience of someone else," would make impossible any acceptation of the facts of history, geography, physics, and biology; testimony, no less than experience, is a ground of belief. Bradlaugh did good work for Theism in helping the clearing away of those superstitions which cumbered and defiled it; he helped to make it for ever impossible to believe in that travesty of God which until recent years was presented in the name of religion; ours is it to build on the ground the great Iconoclast and such as he have cleared.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

BIBLE SCENES.

V.—OUR FRIEND THE ENEMY.

DEAR CHILDREN.—You have read or you will read and hear about a very troublesome person called Satan. You will be bound to consider the question who he is and what he does. In the New Testament, Matthew, Mark, and Luke all tell us that shortly after Jesus had been baptized by John in the river Jordan, he found himself led away into the wilderness, and there he was tempted for many days by Satan. We read that he constantly resisted the tempter, and in the end came off entirely victorious; he did nothing wrong, and after all that he passed through he was still pure and good, as before.

It is not very easy to understand what sort of a being this tempter was supposed to be, but we find more about him in the Book of Job. This is a sort of miracle-play, in three parts. In the first part the action takes place mainly in heaven. In the second part the scene is in this world; and in the third part a voice speaks out of heaven to those who have been arguing on earth. In the first part, then, you may suppose that you are looking at what takes place in heaven. It represents that God has a number of angels, who, after they have done what they have been appointed to do, come to give in their report. And when our play begins, we see them one after another, each presenting his account. Then comes one less pleasing, with a disappointed look on his face. He has no account to give in. He is called Satan, or the Accuser. But it seems that this time there is no one to accuse. Then God asks him if he ever thought of Job, and what a just man Job is; who worships God, who does the right and hates the wrong, and is always perfect and upright? This question annoys Satan, for he answers: "No wonder. Everything that he has is prosperous. No harm ever reaches him. He gets richer and happier every day. But let things go wrong with him, let him suffer losses, and have troubles to bear, and he will soon be as wicked as anyone."

Then God tells Satan he may try. He may spoil everything that Job possesses, but not touch Job himself. Now Job was rich in sons and daughters, rich in cattle, and sheep, and camels, and all kinds of goods. So Satan goes away. He arranges that a band of robbers shall make a raid upon Job's cattle, and kill the herdsmen that were with them; that lightning should cause a great fire to break out suddenly and kill the sheep; that all the camels should be stolen by some roving tribes of warlike robbers; and, lastly, that all Job's sons and daughters shall be killed by a terrible tempest that destroys the house where they were having a pleasant meeting together.

These calamities happen so rapidly that the full news of one disaster is not heard before another is reported.

But Job heard all these evil tidings, and still kept his patience. He put on the signs of mourning, as he was bound to do. But he said nothing rash, and did nothing wrong. He began the world with nothing, he said, and he should finish with nothing. Blessed be the name of the Lord.

Then there is a second meeting in heaven. The angels give in their reports as before. And Satan is asked about Job. "Do you see how he keeps on his way, perfect and just, and blameless, as before, though you have been trying to destroy him?" All very well, Satan replies. When a man is in desperate danger he is glad to escape with his life. But just let him taste personal suffering, and he will be as wicked as anyone. Then again Satan has permission to try. And he goes away. In a little while Job is attacked with a fearful disease. He is sore and swollen in his limbs, and all over his body. He is so altered that his friends would not know him. He is restless by night, and in pain by day. His mouth is out of taste, so that he cannot enjoy any kind of food. Time seems endless to him, and he longs for the rest of death.

Job's wife, who had borne all his first griefs gently with him, loses all patience with this new trouble. She wishes him to give over trust in God altogether. He finds her words a new trouble, and reproves her. At first he asks boldly, "If we receive good from God, why should we not be ready to receive evil?"

But his own mind is greatly hurt. He had been a very good man. And his trouble is something terrible.

When some friends come to see him, Eliphaz and Bildad and Zophar, he pours out his mind to them, and speaks bitterly of his affliction. He wishes he were dead, and talks wildly to them.

Their argument with him fills up the second part of the miracle-play. They tried to prove that all was right, though they must have had their doubts. But all that part we must pass over.

Then at last there is a voice from heaven to earth, in which God makes Job to feel that he knows so very little, and that he is not able to understand all the ways of God, but must trust in Him, and wait. But Job is praised for having been faithful and sincere.

In the end, after the main drama is over, we are told that Job received his possessions and his family again, and lived happily for a long time.

But Satan, where is he? Not a word more is said of him. And we do not have another scene in heaven, to see him after he has failed. But, according to this wonderful old drama, it appears that Satan can only do just as much as he is appointed and allowed to do. It appears that if we will resist when we are tempted, and if we will be both patient in trouble, and perfectly honest and sincere in speech, there is no Satan that can do us lasting harm. It is shown that even the ill-luck that befalls us, and the temptations that come before us, have some good use, for they take place by God's permission. As for the enemy, when we have determined to do and say the right, there is no enemy. He vanishes away, and the joy of a good conscience remains. The teaching of the old drama is good.

PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE.

THE reports of the Council meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and of the annual meetings of the Provincial Assembly of London and the South-Eastern Counties, which fill so much of our space this week, suggest many subjects for earnest consideration. Here we offer only two brief notes.

Mr. CAPLETON asked at the Council meeting that the Association should add to its other activities "the encouragement of works of practical Christianity among the churches." To this it was objected that while everyone wished such works to be encouraged, and our churches were not idle in the matter, such an object did not come within the scope of the Association's special work. It is perhaps only a question of what it is wise for the Association practically to undertake. From the position that a session of the annual meeting could not rightly be devoted to the discussion of religious duty in regard to questions of poverty or temperance, we should strongly dissent. The first object of the Association is "The diffusion of the principles of Unitarian Christianity by assisting congregations and missionary preachers, and by such other means as may seem advisable." Surely it might seem advisable sometimes to endeavour to diffuse the principles by encouraging the practice.

In his Assembly sermon, Mr. GARDNER PRESTON asked the question, which has been asked for a hundred years in meetings of our people, and we still survive! The right answer to such a question is, we hold, not to be found in any readjustment of church order or management, but in thinking and talking less about ourselves, and, in single-hearted devotion, giving ourselves to the great purposes of all religion, the realities of faith and worship, and the service of all human needs in a true brotherhood—that is to say, in doing the will of our Father, who is in heaven.

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

COUNCIL MEETING.

THE Council met at Essex Hall, on Wednesday afternoon, the President, the Right Hon. William Kenrick, in the chair. The following members were also present: Rev. F. Allen, Mrs. Aspland, Mr. H. Blessley, Miss Burkitt, Mr. Callow, Mr. Capleton, Miss Clephan, Rev. V. D. Davis, Mr. H. Epps, Rev. J. Harwood, Major-General Jacob, Mr. H. B. Lawford, Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee, Mr. I. S. Lister, Mrs. Mace, Mr. D. Martineau, Rev. H. W. Perris, Mr. Jesse Pilcher, Rev. W. C. Pope, Mr. S. W. Preston, Miss Preston, Mr. Ion Pritchard, Rev. H. Rawlings, Mr. R. Robinson, Mrs. H. Rutt, Mr. W. Spiller, Mr. H. Stannus, Rev. J. E. Strange, Mr. J. Sudbery, Rev. W. G. Tarrant, Miss Tayler, Miss Teschemacher, Sir R. K. Wilson, Rev. W. Wooding, Mr. T. P. Young, and the secretary (Rev. W. Copeland Bowie).

The minutes of the Council Meeting on March 22 were read and confirmed, and the secretary reported the election of the Council at the annual meeting of the Association in Whit-week.

MR. DAVID MARTINEAU offered a welcome to the President on his first taking the chair at a meeting of the Council, and recalled the Presidency of his uncle, Mr. Timothy Kenrick (1872-3), and a great meeting held in Birmingham in connection with the local Association.

The PRESIDENT, in acknowledging the welcome, said he remembered that meeting in Birmingham very well; it was then, he believed, that he first became a subscriber to the Association. Referring to a statement as to the History and Work of the Association, which has just been issued, he said that he found in it nothing to criticise, but much to approve. It suggested the thought, How is it, when the Association is doing such admirable work, that the outward and visible signs of increase in the body are so small in comparison? The answer he suggested was that pioneers must always be few in number as compared with the main force of an army; and they might take to themselves the words of Professor Pfleiderer, as to the International Council: "The keynote in all the addresses was thoughtful sobriety in judging the present, and a joyful and confident hopefulness in regard to the future. One was conscious of serving a cause that for the moment is represented merely by an insignificant minority, with no prospect for a long time to come of any position of public influence, but to which, after all, the future belongs." That had been their position since the founding of the Association, and so they might look confidently to the future. He then dwelt upon some of the chief points of interest in the work of the Association, and concluded by calling upon the Secretary to read the report of the Executive Committee.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE.

The increased work of the Association can only be dealt with by first passing it through various sub-committees who submit reports and recommendations to the full committee. The following are the sub-committees with their respective chairmen for the current year:—Finance: Mr. H. B. Lawford; Scottish: Mr. C. F. Pearson; Publications: Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee; Home Mission: Rev. W. G. Tarrant; Foreign Mission: Rev. J. Harwood; Anniversary and General Purposes: Mr. Ion Pritchard; Civil Rights of Unitarians: Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C. The Executive Committee meet on the second Wednesday of the month, the sub-committees during the previous week, and it is important that correspondents who wish a speedy reply to their requests should bear these dates in mind.

Finance.

The income of the Association for the nine months—January 1 to September 30, 1904—has been as follows:—Subscriptions, £3,985; donations, £255; legacies, £100; collections, £124; dividends and interest, £920; book department, £952; miscellaneous, £167; total income, £6,503. The expenditure during the same period has been:—Home work, £2,324; foreign work, £1,146; book department £715, anniversary expenses, including the printing and issue of the Annual Report, £92; salaries and wages of office and book-room staff, £695; maintenance and other expenses, £139; total expenditure, £5,111. The balance at the bank will soon be exhausted in paying grants and accounts which shortly become due. It is estimated that if all the unpaid subscriptions are paid, the level reached last year will be maintained, but several generous subscribers have died recently, and unless new names are added there will be considerable leakage next year. A donation of £250 (In Memoriam) by the family of the late Mrs. Alfred Lawrence will be applied as an annual subscription extending over five years.

Circular letters inviting congregations to take collections on behalf of the Missionary work of the Association on Sunday, November 20, or other convenient date, have been issued. Last year 218 congregations took part in the Association Sunday collections, and it will be an encouragement to the committee in their large and varied work at home and abroad if this number is not only maintained, but increased this year.

Home Mission Work.

Letters were addressed to a large number of congregations, and to the secretaries of all the District Societies or Unions, offering to send a special preacher, who would endeavour by his presence and words to assist and encourage the congregation in its worship and work. Applications were received from seventy-six congregations, and twenty-eight different ministers have undertaken to render help in this way during October, November, and December. Arrangements will soon be made for a further series of visits in the early part of 1905. The congregations usually suggest the names of a few ministers, and then the Committee try to meet their wishes as far as possible. The Committee would like to see the various district societies and unions undertaking more work of this kind in their several localities with occasional assistance from the funds of the Association towards the necessary expenses.

During the present month People's Services have been held on the Sunday evenings in a large theatre in Oldham. The Rev. James C. Street conducted the opening service, when 1,200 people were present. On the following Sunday there was an attendance of about 1,500, when the Rev. W. G. Tarrant was the preacher. The Rev. J. A. Pearson, minister of the Oldham Unitarian Church, took the third service himself, and he speaks most warmly of the interest created and the good done by the services.

For a third term religious services for undergraduates and others have been organised at Cambridge. The Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter preached on October 16, when the room in which the services are held was quite full. In addition to Mr. Carpenter, the Revs. H. Gow, J. Harwood, W. G. Tarrant, F. K. Freeston, E. W. Lummis, and C. J.

Street will take part. The students themselves now attend to all the local arrangements, Mr. Stratton acting as hon. secretary in succession to Mr. Epps.

The Rev. R. A. Armstrong is delivering his course of six lectures on "Agnosticism and Theism in the 19th Century" to large and deeply interested audiences at Northampton and Nottingham. Arrangements have already been made for the delivery of the lectures early in 1905 at Manchester and London. The Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter will deliver his course of six lectures on "The Christ of the Creeds and of Experience," beginning in November, at Hampstead, Plumstead, and Bournemouth. Early in 1905 he will lecture at Norwich, Exeter, and other centres. The Committee regard this lecturing work by Mr. Armstrong and Mr. Carpenter as most important and valuable; and they desire to express their gratitude to the lecturers, and to the ministers and laymen who have so enthusiastically and successfully organised the meetings.

Since the former meeting of the Council, grants of money for various purposes have been conditionally voted to the following congregations, amounting in all to £1,076 :— Birkenhead, Burnley, Canterbury, Leicester (Narboro'-road), Lincoln, Long Sutton, Llwynrhydowen, Manchester (Broughton, Moss Side, and Pendleton), Newark, Norwich, Nottage, Penrhiw, Raloo, Scarborough. Grants towards the salaries of the Rev. Rudolf Davis, District Minister of the Western Union, and the Rev. John Ellis, District Minister of the Yorkshire Union, have also been voted. Since the retirement of the Rev. W. Griffiths as District Minister of the North Midland Association, it has not been found easy to devise any practicable plan for linking some of the smaller churches together under one minister, but the Committee are not without hope that in co-operation with those locally concerned, some satisfactory solution of present difficulties may soon be discovered. The dearth of suitable men for active and sustained missionary work is one of the chief difficulties for which a solution seems hardest to find.

Publication Work.

There are several new Handbooks of Religion in course of preparation, among those which it is hoped to publish before long are: "The Unity of the New Testament," by the Rev. W. H. Drummond; "The Bible and Modern Criticism," by the Rev. E. W. Lummis; "Ethics and Religion," by the Rev. C. B. Upton; and "Natural Religion," by the Rev. W. J. Jupp. The Committee desire to call renewed attention to the two volumes already published, "Converging Lines of Religious Thought," by Dr. S. H. Mellone, and "The Trinity and the Incarnation," by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong.

The sixpenny editions of "God and the Soul" and "The First Three Gospels" will no doubt have a large sale. To the latter book Mr. Carpenter has contributed a new and important chapter dealing with the historical Jesus, with special reference to modern inquiries and discussions. The sixpenny edition of "The Soul, its Sorrows and Aspirations," by Francis W. Newman, is now in the press; the Rev. C. B. Upton has contributed a valuable Introduction, which will be read with interest.

The Essex Hall lecture, by Professor H. H. Wendt, on "Idea and Reality of Revelation," and his lecture at Oxford on "Typical Forms of Christianity," have been issued as one book. A new edition of "My Pilgrimage from Calvinism to Unitarianism," by the Rev. Alex Webster, has just been issued. The series of "Home Pages," edited by Miss Helen Brooke Herford, have been gathered into a little volume.

There has been a large demand for Unitarian leaflets and pamphlets, necessitating the reprinting of upwards of twenty of the better known tracts, such as "The Jesus of the Gospels and of History," "Strong Points of Unitarian Christianity," "Christianity and Social Problems," "Was Jesus God?" and "The Place of Jesus in Religion." In reply to the aspersions of Dr. Torrey on Unitarianism, two tracts by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, on "The Warrant of Scripture for the Manhood of Christ," and on "Unitarian Christianity," have been published and circulated in large numbers.

The Committee have at present under consideration the preparation of a new series of tracts dealing with problems of religion, old and new, in the light of modern thought and knowledge. Several ministers have recently submitted valuable suggestions to the Committee, many of which they hope to adopt.

There will shortly be published a volume of sermons, "Anchors of the Soul," by the late Dr. Brooke Herford, with a biographical sketch of the preacher by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed. The Rev. Walter Lloyd has prepared a brief treatise dealing with some modern agnostic objections to the foundations of religious belief, under the title of "A Theist's Apology." This book will be published in a few weeks. Members of the Council will be interested to learn that the Centenary edition of the "Life of Dr. Martineau," which the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter is busy writing, is well advanced, and will be published early in 1905. The preparation of the "Life of Dr. Priestley," by the Rev. Alex. Gordon and Mr. Hartog has been delayed, but the committee trust that the delay will not be unduly prolonged.

A third impression of the "Revised Essex Hall Hymnal" has been issued, making 15,000 copies. The committee would call the attention of congregations to the excellence and cheapness of the new book. It is gratifying to find that within such a short time the Hymnal has met with such favour.

Grants of 1,559 books and 33,534 tracts have been made to congregations, ministers, libraries, postal missions, and private inquirers from March 1 to September 30, 1904. These numbers are for England, Ireland and Wales, and are exclusive of those sent abroad or to Scotland.

In order more effectually to bring the publications of the Association under the notice of the members of our churches, the committee co-operated with the Sunday School Association in appointing for a period of six months the Rev. Frederic Allen as Publication Agent. Mr. Allen visited a great many towns, and succeeded in disposing of a large number of books, and though the financial results were hardly what could be called "profitable," there is no doubt that he did good work. He reports that he was everywhere received with cordiality as the agent of the two Associations.

Foreign Mission Work.

The Rev. Charles Hargrove, as the representative of the Association, has now completed his missionary work in Australasia, and is expected home by the end of November. The committee, instead of holding the customary autumnal meeting, propose arranging for a special gathering in London, or some other convenient centre, to welcome Mr. and Mrs. Hargrove on their return, and to hear from him an account of his travels and experiences. Perth, Adelaide, Melbourne, Hobart, Launceston, Sydney, Brisbane, Auckland, Wellington, Dunedin, and Christchurch, as well as a few suburban towns, were visited. Everywhere he was received with courtesy and sympathy, and in most places large and attentive audiences listened to his message. A few days ago, Mr. Frederick Sinclaire, M.A., arrived in England from New Zealand to pursue a course of study at Manchester College in preparation for the Unitarian ministry in his native land. The sub-committee had the pleasure of meeting Mr. J. C. Macky and his wife and daughter, who are on a visit to England from Auckland, and of learning from him the bright hopes that are held respecting the future of Unitarian Christianity in New Zealand.

In India generous aid has been given towards the expenses of courses of lectures on liberal religion by able and devout leaders of the Brahmo Somaj or Theistic Church. Assistance has also been rendered to Postal Mission work at Allahabad, Bombay, Calcutta, and Madras. Through these and other channels 2,369 Unitarian books and 50,521 tracts have been circulated during the last six months, and nearly every post brings fresh requests. Many hundreds of University graduates have applied for copies of Mr. Armstrong's book, "God and the Soul." Classes for the study of this book are held at Calcutta and other places.

The missionary work in the Khasi Hills district has not been in a very satisfactory condition for some time past. For the present the committee have entrusted the general oversight of the Unitarian Mission stations to Mr. Nilmani Chakrabarti, of Cherrapongee, who has had by no means an easy task thrust upon him. Whether it will be possible to organise and develop the Khasi Hills Mission into vigorous helpful life, it is too early to say. The committee were strongly of opinion that the time had come to bring to an end the former methods of administration.

It is gratifying to report that the recently established Unitarian Church in Christiania, under the ministry of the Rev. Herman Haugerud, is making very satisfactory progress. Mr. Armstrong, who on behalf of the Association visited the congregation last May, was greatly impressed by all that he saw and heard. Norway seems to offer an excellent opportunity for the spread of Unitarian Christianity. In Denmark, also, Mr. Berg, Mr. Birkedal, Miss Westenholz, and others are working strenuously on behalf of Liberal religion.

The meetings of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal religious thinkers, which will be held at Geneva during the first week in September, 1905, will help to draw still closer all those who, throughout Europe, are striving to unite pure religion and complete freedom. At the Congress on the History of Religions recently held in Basle, when the Rev. J. E. Carpenter represented the Association, and at the meetings of the Protestantenverein which were held in Berlin, when the Rev. V. D. Davis attended, there were many evidences of the growth of Liberal Christianity, and a strong feeling of fellowship and sympathy with the Unitarians of this country found expression. The members of the Protestantenbond are meeting to-day (Oct. 26) at Dordrecht, and as it was not practicable to send a delegate, a very cordial letter of greeting was forwarded to Dr. Neimeyer, with happy recollections of the International gathering in Holland last year.

To meet the needs of educated Mahommedans in India, "The Faith of a Free Church," by Dr. S. M. Crothers, and "A Rational View of the Bible," by the Rev. C. J. Street, have been translated into Urdu. Various tracts in the Hungarian language have been issued under the direction of Bishop Ferencz, aided by a grant from the Association. Mr. Armstrong's tract, "Unitarian Christianity Explained," has been translated into Italian. Other literature suitable for circulation for distribution in foreign lands is in course of preparation. Attention is also directed to two admirable lectures on New Testament Criticism, delivered at Brussels in French by the Rev. J. E. Carpenter, and since published by M. Fischbacher, of Paris, at the expense of the Association.

McQuaker Trust.

The extraordinary upheaval in the religious thought and life of Scotland, consequent upon the legal decision of the House of Lords, has brought into prominence the question of subscription to creeds and formularies as the basis of Church life and ecclesiastical government. Pamphlets dealing with some of the grave problems awaiting solution in Scotland have been prepared by the Revs. S. H. Mellone, M.A., D.Sc., and Alex. Webster, and will be published in a few days. Many applications for Unitarian literature continue to reach Mr. Webster from correspondents living in the North of Scotland.

The Rev. Felix Taylor is in temporary charge of the congregation at Kirkcaldy, and the Rev. W. Wilson at Kilmarnock. At both places there are many difficulties to be overcome before there is much hope of establishing self-supporting congregations. Indeed, the prolonged experience of the McQuaker Trustees seems to indicate that it is not in that direction that the promotion of Unitarianism in Scotland is to be attained. The circulation of helpful literature by Postal Mission and other agencies, and, where possible, the spoken word of able preachers and lecturers seem to be the most effectual means of reaching thoughtful men and women in that country. The ministers and the people apparently intend before very long to make their own churches free.

The Rev. John Page Hopps delivered a short course of lectures at Ayr. The Rev. R. B. Drummond has arranged for an interesting series of Sunday evening lectures at Edinburgh by representatives of different phases of religious faith. The Rev. E. T. Russell is lecturing on Unitarianism at Govan. The Rev. Alex. Webster is conducting special services in a public hall at Aberdeen. The visit of Mr. W. Arthur Sharpe, accompanied by the secretary, to the Unitarian churches in Scotland was reported at the annual meeting of the Association. More recently, the Rev. F. W. Stanley, a member of the committee, visited Aberdeen and Dundee, and conducted services: he reported that he was impressed by the signs of activity and life which he found at both places.

Deceased Members.

It is with deep regret that the committee report the death of Mrs. W. Jenkin Davies. Before her marriage, Mrs. Davies was for several years a devoted and active member of the Executive Committee of the Association, and she endeared herself to all her fellow-workers by her quiet faithfulness and unassuming goodness. The late Mrs. Cooke, of Guildford, for many years local treasurer of the Association, was well known to several of our ministers and other visitors to Guildford, and no one who had the opportunity of meeting her could fail to be impressed by the charm and sweetness of her character. Her appreciation of the work of the Association is shown by her legacy of £550. The late Mr. Alfred Paget, of Leicester, bore an honoured name in our religious community. A lay student at York in the far distant days when Dr. Martineau was a divinity student, he retained a warm interest throughout his long life in liberal religious thought, and he generously supported many beneficent agencies. Mr. J. P. Thomasson, of Bolton, was one of nature's noblemen. A philanthropist by instinct, he bestowed his gifts with considerate care and wisdom, and without a trace of self-seeking. Mr. Thomasson and Mr. Paget were not members of the Council, but they were liberal subscribers to the funds of the Association, and they were men whom any organisation may be proud to reckon among its supporters. To the relatives and friends of the deceased, the Committee would tender through the Council their respectful sympathy in the loss which they have sustained.

Statements were then made by the Chairman of the "Home Mission," "Foreign," and "Publications" sub-committees.

The Rev. W. G. TARRANT, speaking of the Home work, said they were grateful to many ministers who had undertaken special work on their behalf, and grateful also to their congregations who spared them for it. A special word of gratitude was due to the Rev. James Harwood for what he had done in the visitation of congregations. Of the People's Services, he recorded his own experience at the Oldham Theatre as having been most impressive, and spoke with great satisfaction of the success of the services at Cambridge.

The Rev. J. HARWOOD, on "Foreign" work, referred to Mr. Hargrove's visit to Australia, and said they had special cause for congratulation in New Zealand, where the Auckland congregation, under their friend, the Rev. W. Jellie, after only four years, had sent word that after the present year they would not require any more assistance from the Association. He spoke with great regret of the illness of Mr. Yoshimoto, the Japanese student at Manchester College, Oxford, which obliged him to return to his own country; and, referring to the Unitarian work in the Khasi Hills, and certain dissatisfaction that had arisen owing to the policy of the committee, asked that their friends should have confidence in the committee, as having the single desire to see that the work was carried out in the best possible manner. He spoke warmly of the disinterestedness and capacity of Mr. Chakrabarti, the Brahmo missionary in that district, to whom they had entrusted a certain oversight of the work.

Mr. T. GROSVENOR LEE, on Publications, spoke with great satisfaction of the success of the revised Essex Hall Hymnal, which had already reached a third edition, and other forthcoming works. He called attention to the new edition of Mr. Carpenter's "First Three Gospels," now to be had for 4½d., as a marvel of cheapness.

The PRESIDENT then moved the adoption of the Report, and Major-General JACOB, in seconding, spoke with satisfaction of the work of the Association, and reported the good progress made by the Tavistock congregation.

The Report was unanimously adopted.

Practical Christianity.

Mr. E. CAPLETON moved a resolution, of which he had given notice. He rejoiced, he said, in the grand work of the Association in disseminating the principles of a liberal theology; but more was required of those who professed a religion of love to God and man, and he asked that at their next session one meeting should be devoted to some measure of practical Christianity. Among their own churches something might be done, e.g., to organise the distribution of hospital notes, and to stop the leakage, caused by people in troubled circumstances, who, because they could not pay subscriptions, withdrew from church fellowship just when they were most in need of its sympathy. Then, beyond the borders of their churches, what were they doing for the submerged millions? The Salvation Army and the Church Army did their part, and other bodies also. They, with their principles, ought to do more and not less. He moved:—

That it is desirable for this Association to devote itself to the encouragement of works of practical Christianity among the churches as well as to the other branches of work in which it is engaged.

Mr. T. PALLISTER YOUNG seconded, particularly because he felt so strongly on temperance reform. He felt it a disgrace that the Association could not find time, as other bodies did, to devote to it.

Mr. BLESSLEY said he thought the churches did their fair share of such work.

The PRESIDENT referred to the work of the Domestic Missions in their great cities, which would not submit to management from London; they were doing independently just the work for which Mr. Capleton asked.

Sir R. K. WILSON said they should be cautious in adopting such a resolution; it was outside the scope of their official work, which was the reforming of religious thought.

Mr. RICHARD ROBINSON said he might agree that it was not the Association's work, but certainly that Association, or some other body, would have to take the matter up, as of the utmost importance to the religious life of the churches, to themselves, and the community in which they lived. The Domestic Mission alone could not cope with the magnitude of that work. He felt there was some truth in Mr. George Cadbury's criticism of the churches, that they attended or tried to attend to the first of the two great commandments, but had omitted the second. If they thought they had completed their Christian duty in correcting certain theological errors, they not only neglected duty, but starved their own nature. The only hope was in the generous giving of themselves for the sake of others. He trusted that there would be some organised movement of their churches in that direction.

Mr. STANNUS hoped the motion would not be put to the vote, and the PRESIDENT said that in his judgment it was out of order, as the matter did not come within the objects of the Association.

The Rev. W. G. TARRANT said that in supporting churches they were substantially doing such work. He hoped their object would not be so narrowly defined as to exclude interest in the matters referred to. Theirs was not a dry theological propaganda, but a religious propaganda, which must include social work.

The motion was then withdrawn, the mover and seconder expressing themselves satisfied that the subject had been brought to public notice.

On the motion of Mr. DAVID MARTINEAU, a cordial vote of thanks was passed to the President, and the meeting terminated.

OUR CHURCHES AND SOCIAL PROBLEMS.

SIR,—I think all who have read Mr Harwood's letters must have recognised the sound judgment and admirable spirit displayed in them. They are calculated to be extremely useful.

In concluding, however, he expresses an opinion upon which I should like to be permitted to ask him a question. How does he propose that any Church shall inspire its adherents with principles that shall make them eager for the duties of citizenship, unless the Church makes it a part of its duty to show how the principles are to be applied to the problems of citizenship?

I venture to affirm that to-day's work for the churches is not the inspiring of principles. Practically, we are all agreed about principles. The great need of our time is to be able to see how to apply them to the complications of society and one great reason why working-men and business dependents, and professional people—the great mass of the population, in fact—are so contemptuously holding aloof from the churches is that they teach one set of principles on Sundays, and at least acquiesce in a totally different set on weekdays. The church's principles, it is felt, are all very fine, but they have little application to real life, and, with the growing stress and strain of daily existence, this feeling is deepening and spreading. G. F. MILLIN.

Brixton, Oct. 24.

SIR,—If Mr. Harwood deems himself "presumptuous to express an opinion" on the above subject contrary to that held by many of his friends, I find myself without a word to express my audacity in venturing to differ from him in his concluding remarks in the last letter on "Our Churches." Only the strong sense of the importance of the decision which is being, and will have to be made, by our churches, as well as by all churches, must be my defence for expressing my regret that Mr. Harwood's great influence should be thrown, as I think, in the wrong direction. Mr. Harwood says that our churches really exist for "the public worship of God and the moral and religious culture of their members." Agreed; but how is this moral and religious culture best carried on? Not only by the emotions and meditations called up by public worship, and the thoughts arising from it, but surely also by an endeavour to put into active practice the lessons there learnt, the impulses to good there engendered. And can there be any better way of putting into active practice these lessons and impulses than by a strenuous endeavour to understand and ameliorate the various ills of humanity which we see around us? That is to say, the study and the active consideration of social and political problems.

Which, after all, is the best nursery for the spiritual graces of a life full of love to God? Is it not in the sincere and earnest devotion to the love and service of man, rather than to the contemplation and culture of one's own personal relation to God? Is it not true that he loves God best who serves his fellow man? What is the special function of a Christian Church? Is it possible to conceive of it apart from the daily and hourly interest in, and care for, those of its fellows—whether inside or outside its borders—who need its help?

Mr. Harwood thinks that the active interest of the churches in these causes will be bad for the causes themselves. But he elsewhere finely puts it that it is Christian zeal and philanthropy that prompts and inspires a large number of those who take part in these causes. Will these efforts not gain immensely from the avowed fact, avowedly stated, that the inspiring force behind these efforts for the public weal is a religious force, a force of the churches as such?

Such an avowal, strenuously maintained and acted upon, might enlist among the churches many who now stand outside, and use with effect the quotation Mr. Harwood uses too, "By their fruits ye shall know them." Why should we have to enter into fresh kaleidoscopic combinations whenever we wish to further some active movement for the benefit of our fellows? It is the religious impulse and resolve which prompts our peace, temperance, housing, purity, prevention of cruelty to children and animals, relief of poverty, care of diseases, provision of work, care for the aged and infirm, economic enfranchisement efforts. Why should it be deemed necessary that we should form separate societies and separate committees, each with only one of our common duties before them, and, consequently, apt to unduly elevate that to an importance and an exclusive position denied to the rest? Would not a larger and a saner view be at once gained if all alike were recognised as the common and necessary duty of every church, and every member of a church, by the fact of their existence and membership? That this is being recognised more and more is, of course, quite apparent. The fact that at present the churches are attacking the problem sectionally does not seem to me to be deplored; it is a necessary step to a wider combination.

When once it is recognised that the Christian Social Union, the Salvation Army and its social movement, the Presbyterian Social Union, the Social Service Committee of the Society of Friends, the Congregational Social Committee, the Public Questions Committees of our own Assemblies are all aiming at one and the same end, by similar and converging methods, the immense advantages to be gained by united effort will not be long in impressing themselves upon the rapidly approaching religious communities; and it may be found that the unity of the spirit will be first found rather in the service of man even than in the thought of God.

Mr. Harwood deprecates the intrusion of subjects which divide into church "enclosures"—surely an unfortunate word. If, indeed, they are to be "enclosures," there is no hope for them; and, in common with other reformers, we must first level the fences. Let us abandon the idea of our own "enclosures," and seek the wider liberty of a common humanity in a common service. RICHD. ROBINSON.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE.

SIR,—Yesterday I received by post a printed pamphlet, headed "Manchester College, Oxford," entitled:—

HISTORICAL STATEMENT.

Issued in view of the special meeting of the Trustees called for Tuesday, November 29, 1904, at 11.30 a.m., at Oxford, in response to a requisition signed by forty-five of their number, asking for such meeting to be called in London, to consider a Resolution affirming the Nonconformist and non-subscribing character of the institution.

It is a matter of surprise to me that there should be nothing to show who is responsible for the matter contained in the pamphlet and its issue.

As those to whom the pamphlet has been sent might possibly consider, in the absence of any such intimation, that the statement is an official one, I write to say that it is not so, and that the College authorities are not in any way responsible for it.

I beg also to point out the somewhat unusual step taken by those issuing the pamphlet in announcing (on their title page) the date and place of a Special Meeting of the trustees which had not yet been summoned.

THE HIBBERT JOURNAL.

SIR,—I noticed in the last issue of THE INQUIRER an admirable suggestion from Mr. Mackie, viz., that certain members of our churches should club together to take the Hibbert Journal, and pass it from one to another until all had read it, finally placing it in the library. In Chester we have done this from the commencement, and at the end of the year we have it bound, and placed in the Church library. I hope this scheme will be adopted widely.

Foregate-street, Chester.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

YORKSHIRE.

IT may seem somewhat peculiar for one who has only resided and worked a short twelve months in the Yorkshire district to write the Provincial Letter, but the regular correspondent, whose long years of service in the county well entitle him to speak for the state of Unitarianism and the churches in which it is preached, is in the other hemisphere doing useful work for the cause to which we are all supposed to be attached. Besides, I am assured by the Editor and on the spot that the very fact of comparative newness here, along with the further fact of considerable knowledge of the state of our churches elsewhere, may give an interest of its own to what I write. So this must be my justification.

The general impression I get is one of something being lacking. In so large a county the difficulties are necessarily great in the way of an adequate and thorough co-operation. This must count for something in any judgment that is formed. But difficulties are made to be overcome, and where there is a will there is generally a way. The cause of the unsatisfactory state of things must lie deeper than this. Causes, it may be; and I think there probably are several, though I do not yet feel qualified to speak with certainty. This I know, however, that until some three years ago not a single new congregation had come into and maintained existence within a period of more than a quarter of a century. Within that period also some of the churches have lost ground, as is almost inevitable in any considerable group of congregations, so changeable are the conditions of various localities. Perhaps some of the churches are stronger than they were, though I have not many facts in this direction to go upon. One thing I am quite sure of—namely, that if in any district we are not content merely to mark time, or even lose ground, we must keep our eyes open for opportunities of advance, and take them when they are presented to us.

It is a grave mistake to imagine, as I find some Yorkshire friends do (and the delusion is not confined to Yorkshire, by any means), that we ought to make all our struggling little congregations financially independent before we begin operations in new fields of service, white already unto harvest. That is a message of death, not of life. It is the sure way to ultimate and deserved extinction. Some of our congregations can never be financially independent unless the conditions of the community in which they are placed are very materially changed, or unless steps are taken to give them an endowment. And to stand aside when the call for our free and reasonable gospel comes from the busy hives of industry in the crowded centres of population is to miss a splendid opportunity, and decline an obvious duty. "To him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin." That is my deliberate opinion, though I know it does not meet with approval from those whose eyes are mainly fixed on the purse-strings.

However, the Yorkshire Unitarians are themselves aroused to the unsatisfactory condition of things in their midst, and the great and successful effort recently made in the County Bazaar, resulting in a balance of over £4,000, was a remarkable sign of a new spirit and intention. The first application of this new fund has taken shape in the appointment of the Rev. John Ellis as District Missionary. This appointment has given universal satisfaction, and we consider ourselves fortunate in being able to secure one who understands the needs of the county so well, and is himself understood and trusted by all. Mr. Ellis will have responsible charge of the congregations at Dewsbury, Elland, and Pepperhill, which are now without minister. He will have general oversight of the mission work of the district, and be ready to lend a helping hand to the assisted congregations, or indeed to any of the churches where he can render useful service. He will be the guide, philosopher, and friend of the strong body of lay preachers, who regard him with especial favour. And he will organise lectures and services at Barnsley and other centres of population where we have at present no outpost of the faith. He will have his hands full, it will be seen from this general summary of the nature of his work. It is impossible for him to do all this alone, so the Union is in search of an assistant missionary who will act under his guidance in the work of the province. Great hopes are fixed on the results of this new development under the two-missionary ministry.

The bazaar fund was raised for several specific objects. This missionary scheme was one. Another was the clearance of the debt on the general funds of the Union. That has been done, and for the first time for many years the Union stands without a heavy adverse balance. But the annual income is very far short of what is necessary to meet the regular annual expenditure, and a new debt will soon accumulate unless steps are speedilytaken to increase the income. Some time after the New Year an attempt will be made to put this right, and I plead aforetime with the members of our Yorkshire churches who may read this letter that they should be ready when the time comes to give a more generous support to the needs of their central society. There is ability if there is only will. The subscription list and the chapel collections are most inadequate, and do not represent one half or one quarter of what might or ought to be done. If I may venture to say so, they compare unfavourably with what is done in some other districts,

Further purposes contemplated by those who raised the Bazaar Fund were the assistance of congregations in special efforts to improve or extend their buildings and the foundation and development of new movements. The Committee have now under consideration several applications which have been made from churches in the Union, and before these lines are in print will have decided how many of them they will support, and to what extent. Further applications will doubtless be made in due course and considered on their merits. And a certain proportion of the balance will be set aside for new work, so that the reproach which has attached to Yorkshire Unitarianism for so long is in reasonable prospect of being taken away. That should be cause for general satisfaction.

In this connection I may be pardoned for calling attention with some pride and pleasure to the fact that Sheffield is responsible for the one new congregation to which I have previously referred. My predecessor, Mr. Manning, in conjunction with Mr. Ellis, while he was still at Upperthorpe, before going to London, and with the co-operation of lay friends from both the Sheffield churches, began a mission movement at Attercliffe, a crowded working-class district on the northern side of the city. There, for three years, a new congregation has more than held its ground under very adverse conditions. They have no place of their own, meeting only in an upstairs room of the Vestry Hall, with a Socialist meeting going on simultaneously in the room below, and with no possibility until now of having any week-night meetings or institutions. This struggling mission was, when I came to Sheffield, taken over by Upper Chapel, with the full sympathy of the Upperthorpe congregation, and made into a daughter church. The assistant minister of Upper Chapel (first the Rev. E. E. Jenkins, removed to Walmsley, and now the Rev. Henry Dawtrey) is the curate-in-charge of Attercliffe under my supervision. There is an average attendance of about fifty at the services, and a Sunday-school of over eighty scholars. There is a fine set of workers, and the spirit among them is all that could be desired. What they need now is suitable premises of their own to worship and work in. They have pleaded their cause before the Upper Chapel authorities and received their benediction, and as soon as a judicious and practicable scheme can be presented, an attempt will be made by themselves and their Sheffield and other friends to get for them what they sorely need.

Upperthorpe, the elder child of the venerable Upper Chapel, is in a very healthy condition, and is prospering and happy under the ministry of the Rev. A. H. Dolphin. The good folk there are already beginning to scheme and plan what shall be done to celebrate the jubilee of the church, which occurs five years hence. Well for a congregation when it dares to look so far ahead. The three congregations in Sheffield are drawn closely together by the issue of a joint eight-page calendar, "The Sheffield Unitarian Monthly Record," by a common interest in the Attercliffe movement, by an occasional united conversazione, such as we had to give a welcome to Mr. Ellis on his return to the district, and by the cordial friendship and co-operation of the ministers.

Of the mother church at Sheffield itself I will only say that the first year of my ministry closed there last Sunday. For me, and for the congregation, I believe, it has been a happy one, and it has been marked by substantial progress shown in many ways. It is too soon to add more than that. While we have every reason for satisfaction so far, there is plenty more to be done, and we are all hopeful.

The chapel on the hills at Stannington is carrying on its good work and maintaining its position as a living congregation under the ministry of my venerable friend, the Rev. Iden Payne, who is now in his 83rd year and still on active service. We are all proud of him, and no wonder, for he is lovable in himself and at the same time, I believe, the oldest of our ministers in charge of a congregation. A good deal of money has had to be spent at Stannington in necessary repairs, &c., and the trustees are unfortunately a good bit behindhand in their accounts in consequence, but in every other respect there is reason for satisfaction at the state of the congregation.

Further afield I do not venture to go on this occasion. Of these particular churches I speak that which I do know. Much more needs to be said about other Yorkshire churches, but for them I have no sufficient warrant or knowledge to speak. I close with the note of thankfulness that a better spirit is showing itself in the Province generally, and that the conditions are such now that with a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull all together, we shall be able to achieve greater things in the future.

Oct. 24, 1904.

MR. JOHN EWART, M.A., Hibbert Scholar, and lately of Manchester College, Oxford, has passed the final examination for the degree of B.D. of the Edinburgh University. The examiners report that Mr. Ewart made an excellent appearance in all departments.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Aberdare.—At the Harvest Thanksgiving at the Old Meeting House on Sunday and Monday last, three of the services were conducted by the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, Bradford, and the fourth by the Rev. J. Morgan Jones, a Congregationalist minister, whose service was greatly appreciated. Mr. Ceredig Jones is President of the South Wales Unitarian Association this year, and though he has spent the greater part of the last 30 years in England, he preaches in his native Welsh with great acceptance.

Bolton: Bank-street.—The Spinners' Hall was crowded on Tuesday to hear the first of eight lectures of Religious Instruction announced by the Rev. J. H. Weatherall, the minister of Bank-street chapel. He began by explaining that the object of the lectures was positive and constructive, their aim being to show some of the bases in science, history, or experience, of certain leading religious ideas, and to point their consequences for aspiration and conduct. The subject of the first lecture was "The Life and Death of Doctrine," and at the close Mr. Weatherall promised that he would answer questions or clear up difficulties for his hearers, if they would communicate with him by letter, and announced the subject for next week's lecture as "The Ascent of Man; or, Religious Inferences from the Evolution of Humanity."

Boston.—Mr. W. H. Shrubsole preached twice at Spain-lane Chapel on Sunday, and on Monday gave his lecture on "The Yellowstone Park of America," to an audience which crowded the largest hall in the town. It was the second time that Mr. Shrubsole had given this lecture, with its splendid pictures, in Boston, where his visits are welcomed by the townspeople of all creeds and political opinions.

Burnley (Appointment).—The Rev. J. Morgan Whiteman, of Dewsbury, has accepted a unanimous invitation to the pastorate of Trafalgar-street Church, and will commence his ministry there on Nov. 1.

Cardiff.—A public meeting was held in Westgrove Church on Oct. 13, when the Rev. Dr. Warschauer and the Rev. Hugh C. Wallace, of Bristol, gave addresses on "Dr. Torrey's Propaganda." The church was filled to overflowing, and a number of those who were unable to gain admission gathered in the schoolroom, where a meeting was hastily improvised, and addressed in turn by the above speakers. The addresses evidently convinced the larger part of both audiences that the propaganda in question had seriously misrepresented and unjustly maligned both Unitarians and leading Congregationalists of the advanced school, but much disorder was caused by unseemly interruptions on the part of Dr. Torrey's sympathisers. This was all the more unpardonable because the chairman of the principal meeting, Mr. G. Carslake Thompson, had made quite clear the readiness of our own Church to appreciate whatever was good in the "Mission," and Rev. W. Whitaker held a similar attitude as chairman in the schoolroom.

Croydon: Domestic Mission. — The eighteeenth annual meeting of this mission was held at Dennett Hall on Thursday evening, October 20, the Rev. W. J. Jupp in the chair. The report referred to the great loss sustained in the death of Mr. Henry Green, who had always taken a very active personal interest in the mission, and had been treasurer and superintendent of the Sunday-school since its beginning. Mrs. Grover was connected with the mission during the same period, and Mrs. Bullock had been identified with the work carried on in the hall for the past 14 years. The Committee hoped this loss of their active workers would induce those who remained to work harder so that the good done by the Mission in past years might be sustained. The report then dealt with various agencies of the Mission, giving particulars of the Sunday-school, the Band of Hope, various clubs, and the savings bank. Last year 156 tons of coal were distributed among 230 members. Contributions were required for the library so that modern literature could be represented in it. The gymnasium had been doing good work, 21 boys having joined. Mr. J. Williams read the financial statement, showing the balance in hand at the end of September was £7 0s. 9d., but subsequent expenses left them with a balance on the wrong side of £14. He moved the adoption of the report and balance-sheet. Mr. Gosling seconded, and the report was unanimously adopted. The Chairman then said they had a duty to perform, which was at once sacred, sorrowful and beautiful. It was exactly four months ago that night that their friend, Mr. Henry Green, was taken from them, and his friends had decided to place in that room, where he laboured so earnestly and faithfully for many years, a memorial to him, which he was now to unveil. He wished Mr. Street could have been there to take that duty, because he, with Mr. Green, had been the founder of that mission. Most of them would remember that on the last Sunday of his life, the day before he died, Mr. Green was there in the afternoon at his post, faithful to the end. His humane public spirit led him into political and municipal work as well as into the social and philanthropic work of which he was so fond. He was sure that those who knew him in his various relationships in life, those who knew him longest and most intimately in life honoured him the most, but outside his own family and closest friends none, perhaps, loved and honoured him more than those with whom and for whom he laboured in connection with that mission. So it was fitting and beautiful that a simple memorial should be placed on those walls in his memory. It would be something more than a memorial. It should be an appeal to them to labour in the service as he did. To come into that room and see that memorial would freshly remind them of his earnest, faithful, and devoted life; would remind them not only of what he did and tried to do, but also of what he was: would help them to realise what he was in himself, and how to all who knew him he was so good, so kind and so true. Mr. Jupp then unveiled the memorial, which was a plate of beaten copper on a background of oak, and he read while all stood in deep silence, the following inscription:—"In affectionate memory of Henry Green, an ever faithful friend and worker at Dennett Hall since its foundation in 1886, who died June 20th, 1904." Mr. Matthews afterwards made a statement as to the work of the Mission, saying that it had been decided that for the present they must do without a lay-helper, and a pension of £20 was voted to Mr. Bullock. The Rev. Henry Gow then gave a most interesting address on Domestic Mission Work, the Rev. W. J. Jupp was elected president for the coming year, and the officers were re-elected. A vote of thanks to the chairman and Mr. Gow, proposed by Mr. Cox, the secretary, and seconded by Mr. Bullock, brought the meeting to a close.

Cullompton.—The Devon Ministers' Conference met on Wednesday, October 19, when a congregational tea in the schoolroom was followed by a public meeting. Rev. A. E. O'Connor, of Torquay, welcomed the Rev. Rudolf Davis, the newly-appointed District minister, and spoke on the question: "Why should we keep apart from joining the membership of other denominations?" Rev. J. Barron gave an address on "The Essence of Religion," and Rev. A. Lancaster spoke on "Loyalty to Unitarianism." Mr. Davis, in responding to the welcome, said the most important part of his work would be to carry influences of goodwill from congregation to congregation. Rev. W. Agar bade farewell to Rev. G. L. Phelps, whose ministry at Devonport had just closed, and spoke highly of the good work he had done. Rev. J. M. Connell spoke on the "Intelligent reading of the Bible." Mr. Phelps, in his reply, addressed the children present on "Following the Gleam." Addresses were also made by Mr. Amey, of Colyton, Mr. Homer, of Taunton, and Miss Stewart, of Crediton. A touching incident was a short address from Mrs. Middle, who stated she had attended the Cullompton Chapel for seventy years. The Benediction, pronounced by the Rev. Jeffery Worthington, brought to a close a hearty and inspiring meeting.

Evesham (Farewell Presentation).—On Thursday evening, October 20, the members of the Oat-street congregation invited the Rev. Rudolf and Mrs. Davis, who have recently removed to Bridgwater, to a social meeting in the schoolroom. The room had been carpeted and decorated and furnished as a drawing-room, and there was a large attendance. Mr. A. H. Martin, as chairman of the congregation, expressed the regret of the congregation at losing Mr. Davis as their minister, and their great appreciation of his work among them. He then read and presented an address, signed by the officers of the congregation and all the members, the number exceeding 100. In the following terms the congregation offered to Mr. Davis "most heartfelt and sincere thanks for the great services you have rendered us during the eleven years over which your ministry has extended. Not only are we mindful of the work you have done among us as our minister, but we take this opportunity of also expressing our gratitude and that of very many of our fellow townsmen, not members of this congregation, for your constant and less obvious ministrations to the poor and suffering, irrespective of sect or creed, and for the large share you have taken in the public works of this borough, where your charity, good works, and public spirit will long be remembered." The address, which is finely engrossed and illuminated, bears on the first page a picture of the Oat-street Chapel, by Mr. E. H. New, and was bound by the Campden Guild of Handicraft. Accompanying the address was a beautifully embroidered case containing banknotes for £50, towards which every member of the congregation had subscribed. Mr. Geoffrey New, on behalf of the congregation, then presented Mrs. Davis with a gold and pearl neck-chain, as an expression of their appreciation of her work as their minister's wife. Mr. Davis, in reply, thanked the members of the congregation for their goodness to Mrs. Davis and himself during the whole period of his ministry, as well as for their address and parting gifts. He said the address expressed what he had wished to do; he feared it valued too highly what he had done. He appealed specially to the younger members of the congregation to be loyal to the work, as their parents had been. The Unitarian churches stood for a great and sacred principle, for the essence of religion which ran through all forms—be good, do good, and first of all love good in order that you may be and do good; love God and your fellow-men. Thus Unitarians stood for the simple essence of all religion and left everything of creed to the individual worshipper. It was a principle worth cherishing and worth serving. The Sunday-school had previously made a farewell presentation to Mr. Davis on its own account.

Exeter (Resignation).—The Rev. J. M. Connell has resigned his position as colleague to the Rev. T. W. Chignell in the ministry of George's Chapel. The resignation will take effect at the end of March, 1905.

Gateshead.—The harvest festival services, on Sunday, October 9, were conducted by Rev. G. A. Ferguson; and on Wednesday, October 12, the first social gathering of the congregation for the season was held, when Mrs. Ferguson received a hearty welcome from the officials and friends of the church.

Liverpool: Domestic Mission. — On Thursday evening, Oct. 13, a very interesting meeting took place in the large hall of the Mill street Mission. This year marks the completion of 25 years of faithful service on the part of Mr Joseph Anderton, and of 21 years by the Rev. T Lloyd Jones, as assistant missionary and mission ary respectively. It was felt that the occasion should not be allowed to pass without some recognition of this striking record, and it was accordingly decided by workers at the Mission and members of the congregation and Sunday-school to ask Mr. Lloyd Jones and Mr. Anderton to accept some small evidence of the regard and affection in which they are held, and as an acknowledgment of their long years of devoted and unselfish labour among the poor of Toxteth. The meeting was attended by a large number of those connected with the congregation and Sunday-school. The chair was taken by Mr. Harold Coventry, an old Mission Sunday-school teacher, supported on the platform by Rev. T. Lloyd-Jones, Mr. Joseph Anderton, and a number of other faithful workers. After a few introductory remarks by the chairman, short speeches were made by Mr. Forwood Heyn, Miss Coventry, Mr. S. McAuslan, and Mr. H. Wardle, after which Mr. McAuslan asked Mr. Lloyd Jones to accept an electro entrée dish, toast rack, and ladle, as a memento of the occasion. Mr. Henning, a member of Mr. Anderton's Bible class, then presented to Mr. Anderton, on behalf of the meeting, a large framed engraving of the Madonna and child. Mr. Lloyd Jones and Mr. Anderton feelingly replied, after which the meeting assumed a social aspect, various items of music being rendered by friends. The spontaneous character of the meeting, the general feeling shown in the speeches, and the whole tone of the proceedings gave evidence of the deep sympathy and affection existing between the missionaries and all those connected with the Mission in various capacities.

London: Brixton.—The local Free Press of Oct. 21, devotes nearly two columns, in a series of articles on "Churches of Brixton" (No. 20), to "Effra-road Unitarian," with an interesting account of the origin and principles of the congregation and its successive ministers, illustrated by ghostly pictures of the chapel and the present minister. From 1861 to 1873 the Rev. T. L. Marshall, for so many years editor of THE INQUIRER, was minister, and earlier in the succession, for fourteen years beginning in 1847, came the Rev. John Harrison, father of the present bearer of that honoured name, who is treasurer both of Effra-road congregation and of the Provincial Assembly.

London: Highgate.—The inaugural meeting of an Adult Temperance Society was held last Saturday evening. The chair was taken by the President, Mr. H. G. Chancellor, supported by Rev. R. H. Greeves and Messrs. F. Withall, J. H. S. Cooper (treasurer and secretary of the Church), Messrs. T. Pallister Young, chairman, and J. Bredall and A. W. Harris, secretaries of the National Unitarian Temperance Association, Mrs. Oates (B.W.T.A.), and several well-known temperance workers of the district. The Chairman said they had for years carried on Band of Hope work, and now wished to attract the parents of the Band of Hope Society's children, and those of the population around, who were not reached by other agencies, on whose work they would not trench, and whose welcome sympathy was manifested by the presence of so many representing local societies. They would preach total abstinence as a means to a happy and healthy life, and hoped to save many from the drink curse, and bring happiness into many lives. They intended to have a pleasant entertainment and concert every Saturday evening, to which all would be welcome without charge, and to deliver their message faithfully to all who attended. Mr. Bredall, having wished them the "God speed" of the Central Society, the Rev. R. H. Greeves urged the necessity for the Churches grappling with the drink evil in no half-hearted manner. Mrs. Coates, British Women's Temperance Association, congratulated the assembly on its decision to have a "live" Temperance Society on Highgate-hill. Mr. T. Pallister Young, Mr. F. Withall, Mr. R. J. Allen, of the Hornsey Rise Guild of Temperance, Mr. F. Tremain, and Mr. A. W. Harris also spoke in strong support of the movement, and a few words of earnest exhortation from the Chairman brought the meeting to a close.

London: Islington. — At the afternoon children's service, in connection with the most successful harvest festival at Unity Church, on Sunday, October 9, the collection for Winifred House was taken as usual. To the Convalescent Home also, and to the North London Nursing Association, the gifts of fruit, &c., were taken on Monday. At the evening service the congregation, which consisted largely of men, numbered about 350, and at the conclusion a cordial invitation was given by the Rev. E. Savell Hicks to the friends and visitors to adjourn to the schoolroom, to meet the minister and members of the church. This was accepted by a large number, and a pleasant half-hour of Social intercourse was the result. These Sunday socials are held regularly on the second Sunday of the month, after evening service, and have proved most useful in increasing the roll of the members, and making them known to each other. During this month Mr. Hicks has been delivering a course of Sunday evening lectures on "Evolution as a Law in Religious Thought," which are exciting interest in the district, and will be continued during November.

London Unitarian Choral Society.—This Society will begin its work for the season next Monday, when the first practice will be held at Essex Hall, at 8.0 p.m. The commencement of practices has been somewhat delayed owing to the regrettable illness of its president, Mr. John Harrison. Dr. Little continues as the conductor, and it is felt that the Society should be able this year to render some material help to our churches. Already several applications have been received for assistance, and it is probable that the Society will take in hand "The Messiah," in view of one of these applications. It is hoped that the Society will be both used and helped by the churches in the district. The committee are anxious that it should be of real service in our denominational life, and this service can only be efficiently rendered if the numerous musical people in our churches will do their best to support and help the work. The annual subscription is 2s. 6d., and the practices before Christmas will be held on October 31, November 21, and December 12.

Manchester: Pendleton. — On Sunday, Oct. 16, special services were conducted by the Rev. H. W. Hawkes, of Liverpool, as representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. The occasion was taken to celebrate the Harvest Thanksgiving, and in the afternoon a sacred cantata, "Under the Palms," was rendered by the choir and scholars, the address being given by the Rev. N. Anderton, minister of the church. The services were very well attended.

Nottingham: Hyson Green.—The annual meeting of the East and West Sub-districts of the N.M.S.S. Association was held on Saturday, Oct. 22, at the above school, when a paper was read on the Summer Session for Sunday School Teachers at Oxford.

Northampton.—For their bazaar to be held n the schoolroom, Nov. 16 and 17, the congregation of the Kettering-road Church have issued an attractive programme, showing the design of the street of an old English town, which is to be represented. For the benefit of outside friends, whose co-operation is invited, it is stated that the church "stands for worship, irrespective of both creed and sect."

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The annual meeting was held at Gee Cross on Saturday, October 15, and was attended by 160 persons. The committee met prior to tea to discuss the stall arrangements for the East Cheshire Christian Union Bazaar, and to arrange the business for the evening, and after tea the retiring President, Mr. W. Lawton, took the chair in the absence of Mrs. Dowson, the President-Elect. The reports of the treasurer and secretary were read and adopted, and the officers for the ensuing year were elected, the only change being the election of Rev. B. C. Constable, as Vice-President. An original paper on "Christianity and the Child" was read by Rev. A. R. Andreae, and a good discussion followed, which, however, was curtailed for want of time. The singing class was present in good numbers, and during the evening rendered several part-songs. The usual votes of thanks closed an interesting meeting.

Scarborough.—In pursuance of the special work recently undertaken by the B and F.U.A., the Rev. Dendy Agate, of Altrincham, and formerly of Scarborough, lectured on Monday evening, October 24, on "Orthodoxy Fifty Years Ago and To-Day." There was a considerable muster present to hear the lecture, including a fair sprinkling of strangers. The lecturer contrasted the position held by "orthodox" people half a century ago in regard to many religious questions with the attitude of orthodox people of to-day, and showed what a striking advance had been made towards "a larger universe, a more indwelling God, a Christ who comes very close to us in our heart and life, a more human Bible, and more abounding hope for humanity." The proposer and seconder of the vote of thanks to the lecturer (the Rev. Ottwell Binns and Mr. H. J. Morton) both added interesting experiences of their own on the changed attitude of those professing orthodox beliefs.

Southport.—The local Guardian of Oct. 26 devotes a column to the sermon preached by the Rev. F. B. Mott, in the Unitarian Church, on Sunday evening, referring to the recent correspondence on the subject of religious belief, in the Daily Telegraph, and urging the need for the earnest preaching of the reasonable faith of Unitarians.

Stannington.—The harvest thanksgiving services on Oct. 16, when the Revs. H. Dawtrey and Iden Payne were the preachers, were a great success, and on the following evening a Service of Song, entitled, "Woodland Music," was beautifully given by the choir, and again the chapel was quite crowded.

Whitchurch.—On Sunday, 23rd inst., a Leaf Service was held. Flower services are customary, but a leaf service appears to be an original idea. The church was tastefully decorated with autumn foliage. The material was somewhat difficult to arrange, but a beautiful effect was produced, and it was an appropriate illustration for the subjects of discourse.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

A SPECIAL meeting of the Trustees of Manchester College is to be held at Oxford on Tuesday, the 29th inst, on the requisition of forty-five Trustees, to deal with a resolution to be moved on their behalf, and an amendment of which notice has been given on behalf of the Committee. The resolution is practically a vote of want of confidence in the present Management of the College, and the gravest issues are involved. We would therefore call the special attention of all Trustees of Manchester College, and indeed of all those who have the interests of the College and of our Free Churches at heart, to the two letters published in our present issue, the one from Dr. Drummond, Principal of the College, the other from two of the Trustees, at whose instance the special meeting has been called. We imagine that they are not the only two of the signatories who must feel some misgivings as to the lines on which this agitation is being conducted in their name, and we would enforce as strongly as possible Dr. Drummond's plea for an open mind on the whole question until the meeting is held.

THE Rev. F. K. Freeston announces what promises to be a most interesting series of five lantern lectures on the history of "Our Religious Principles and Our Free Churches," to be given in the Essex Church School-room, The Mall, Notting Hill-gate, W. The lectures are on Tuesday evenings at 8.30, and admission is free. The first lecture on "Our Nonconformity: Why it had to be," is on Tuesday next, Nov. 8. The last of the series, on Dec. 6, is on "Our London Churches: Their History and Ministry." Mr. Freeston will send a copy of the four-page illustrated syllabus of the lectures to any address on receipt of a post-card at Essex House, Campden Hill, W.

THE new series of Mr. Stopford Brooke's Shakespeare lectures at University College begin on Thursday week, November 17, and not on November 10, as announced on a printed list of lectures issued from the College. Five lectures are announced for successive Thursday evenings, at 8 o'clock, the subjects being Julius Cæsar, Twelfth Night, King Lear, Measure for Measure, and Cymbeline. Tickets for the course are 7s. or for single lectures 1s. 6d. Applications for tickets should be made to the hon. secretary, Stopford Brooke Lectures, University College, W.C.

IT was an unspeakable relief to learn last week from the Prime Minister's speech on Friday night that the Russian and British Governments had come to an agreement to hold an inquiry into the North Sea Outrage under the terms of The Hague Convention. This triumph of good sense over the threatening passions of conflict, in which we thankfully acknowledge that France played a welcome part, relieved a most painful tension. Russia, Mr. Balfour declared, had expressed profound regrets and promised the most liberal compensation. We may leave the conduct of the Russian fleet, therefore, to be dealt with by the International Commission, and when the facts are clearly established may calmly await the issue. The sentiment expressed by the resolution of the Upper Brook-street congregation, given below, will find, we are confident, a very general response throughout our churches.

A SPECIAL meeting of the congregation of the Upper Brook-street Free Church, Manchester, was held after evening service, Oct. 30, the Warden (Mr. Harkness) in the chair. The following resolution, moved by Mr. H. V. Herford, seconded by Mr. Councillor Marsden, and supported by the Rev. Charles Peach, was carried unanimously:—

That this congregation records its grateful sense of the high moral courage shown by the Prime Minister and Cabinet in remitting to an international committee the duty of ascertaining the facts in dispute between this country and Russia, and acknowledges also the friendly offices of the French Ambassador at a time when all sections of the British people were absolutely at one in their indignation. This congregation considers that this brave action of the Government will be far-reaching in its effects in the future as a precedent for the calm treatment of disputes in their early and most critical stage.

THE inquest on the two fishermen killed by the Russian shells in the North Sea was concluded at Hull on Wednesday evening, the jury returning as their verdict a measured statement of the painful facts, and in conclusion an expression of the deepest sympathy with the relatives of the deceased, and also with the injured. The coroner added that he wished to express his appreciation of the calm and courageous way in which the men of the fishing fleet had carried on their work. Whilst subjected to this horrible and sudden fire, they helped each other and went about their business quietly and bravely, and evinced that determination and courage which was always associated with North Sea fishermen.

PREACHING last Sunday morning at Rosslyn Hill Chapel, on "Citizen Sunday," the Rev. Henry Gow referred to the strong feeling of patriotism which had united the whole nation during the preceding week, in the determination to defend the humblest of our fellow-countrymen, or to exact reparation for wrong done to them by a foreign power. For such a purpose, he said, we are prepared to spend millions of money, and tens of thousands of lives. But then, he asked, "Are we equally united in a passionate determination to protect our weaker countrymen against native oppressions? Are we prepared to make anything like the same sacrifices in improving our own internal social arrangements, so that they shall become more just and honourable?" Do we feel "this same corporate responsibility, this determination to work for justice, when we turn our eyes upon the great cities of our land and think of the unmerited suffering, the degrading poverty, the want of work, the miserable homes, which are a disgrace to our civilisation, and a constant evidence of the extreme imperfection of all our attempts at social justice?"

THE question of the Unemployed is undoubtedly at the present moment the most pressing subject of home politics before the country. So prominent has it become that it has withdrawn attention to a large extent from the fiscal question. This is largely due to Mr. Long's action in calling the recent conference. There is some danger of the problem coming to be regarded as a London one. It is larger—a national one. To mention but one instance, there are now over 3,000 unemployed registered in Leeds alone. The situation there has not been so grave since the black winter, 1892–3. The case is as bad in many towns. These facts demand prompt, well-considered, and large remedial measures. It may not be possible to do much this winter; the task is an immense one, and has been so long neglected. Something not inconsiderable has been achieved in gaining an acknowledgment from a responsible government of a work waiting to be done. And the present action of the Guardians and the Council will, it is hoped, allay in some degree the existing distress. But more waits to be done, and that more calls for the most serious and fearless thought, which is equal to costly action.

THE memorial of the Labour members of the House of Commons, presented by Mr. Keir Hardie to the Prime Minister, even though it have no immediate practical result, is in the present condition of the country noteworthy:—

We, the undersigned, being members of the House of Commons, and particularly interested in all that pertains to the welfare of the working people, respectfully join in the request which is being made to you from certain elected bodies in London to advise His Majesty the King to summon a special Session of Parliament. . . Considering the extent of the distress arising directly from lack of employment with which the Boards of Guardians and the Municipal Councils, not only in London, but of nearly every large centre of industry, are called upon to deal, and the limited powers possessed by those bodies for dealing therewith, we are of opinion a short special Session could with advantage be devoted to the consideration of remedial legislation. Unless this course is adopted, we fear that when the regular Session opens, this question . . . will be thrust aside by the press of ordinary business.

A BEGINNING was made last week in giving practical effect to the Lords' decision in the case of the Free Church of Scotland. Principal Rainy and the rest of the staff were forbidden the use of the College in Edinburgh, and the classes are now meeting in rooms placed at their disposal by the University. Admirable articles on the whole case appear this month both in the Quarterly Review and the Edinburgh, taking practically the same view, and showing that the decision of the Lords was inevitable and just according to the law. The conclusion of the Quarterly is as follows:—

If a few just men, outside both churches, but in sympathy with religion, were appointed, on the understanding that they were to take into consideration (1) the legal right of the Free Church; (2) the inequitableness of the situation arising from the fact of so much of the property assigned to her having been bestowed by donors who approved of or entered the union; and (3) the needs of the work to be carried on, and the respective fitness of the two parties to do this, a scheme of division, we feel sure, could be arranged, which, having received the consent of the two churches, would hardly fail to be sanctioned by Parliament.

The Edinburgh says practically the same thing, adding that if a voluntary agreement cannot be arrived at, Parliament must take the initiative. A clear and forcible sermon on the case, "The Church Crisis in Scotland," by Dr. S. H. Mellone, of Holywood, emphasising the moral as to the foundation principle of a church truly free, has just been published by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

THE statue of Milton, erected outside the old church of St. Giles's, Cripplegate, where the poet was buried, was unveiled on Wednesday by Lady Alice Egerton, and the masque of "Comus" was afterwards performed in the hall of the Cripplegate Institute. It was an earlier Lady Alice Egerton, of the same family, who represented the Lady in the first performance of "Comus" in 1634, at her father's castle at Ludlow. The statue is the gift of Mr. Deputy Baddeley. Among the guests present on Wednesday were the Poet Laureate and Lord Rosebery.

AN interesting letter to the Manchester Guardian, from the Rev. Arthur Leslie Smith, called forth by the recent inauguration of the new Faculty of Theology in the Manchester Victoria University, comments on the absence of reference on that occasion to pioneers of an "open Faculty of Theology," which Manchester had a hundred and eighteen years ago in the institution which has now become Manchester College, Oxford. He quotes the opening discourse of Dr. Barnes, some words of which are not without relevance to a controversy now among us on the principles of Manchester College: "You have formed your institution upon the most liberal and generous basis, guarded by no jealous subscription, and open without suspicion or fear to all who wish to enjoy the advantages of science unfettered and free." "Yours is not the cause of any party. You rank yourselves under no distinguishing name." We notice that the new faculty of theology at Manchester includes in its programme a series of popular lectures, to which admission is free, delivered by professors and tutors of a great variety of denominations. Principal Gordon is announced for Nov. 22 on "The Biographical Method in Theology."

Nov. 27 is to be observed as "Temperance Sunday," when ministers are asked to bring the urgency of the Temperance Question before their congregations, and collections are invited on behalf of the work of the National Unitarian Temperance Association. We hear from Mr. F. A. Edwards (56, Eyot-gardens, Hammersmith, W.), treasurer of the Association, that in response to Mr. Bredall's recent letter one new subscription of 5s. has been received, and yet there is urgent work waiting to be done, over which treble the amount of the Association's present subscription list of £44 could well be spent.

THE matter of lay preaching is of so much importance for our churches that any experiments made by our neighbours, for the improvement of its quality or the extension of its scope, cannot be lacking in interest. Such an experiment, of a kind that promises to be exceptionally valuable, is being conducted by Professor Garvie, of New College, London. The intention is to hold a weekly preparation class for those who desire to become lay preachers and feel the need of some help and instruction to qualify them for the task. Dr. Garvie holds the class in New College Chapel, but it is open to all accredited members of other Congregational churches. Dr. Garvie's scholarship will ensure much helpful guidance in what may be termed the technique of the art; but beyond this the class will foster the sense of comradeship in a noble work, and may be expected to yield its members clearer insight into the difficulties and the ideals of the preacher's calling.

THE lay preacher's class is only one of several successive indications of the serious consideration given by the Congregationalists to this branch of their ministry. The Examiner has for some time past been pressing the subject on the mind of the churches, and last week's issue contains an eloquent address on the subject by Dr. Horton which possesses a value reaching far beyond the interests of his own denomination, a value not only for lay preachers, by any means. He regards preaching as a great gift, but one not confined to ordained ministers: it must exist just as widely among those who are not ministers. It is the Church's great function to discover those of her sons and daughters who have this power, and, having found them, to cultivate their faculty, because "if a man has a gift it must be disciplined and trained." Then, when the gift is trained, it is the duty of the Church to put it to good use.

AT the first anniversary of the Wesleyan Mission at Chatham it was stated that in their first meeting at the Town Hall a congregation of between six and seven hundred were gathered, and that was the smallest meeting they had had. Commencing with no members they had now 100 and 31 on trial. Meetings held in common lodging-houses had produced good results. Collections at the Town Hall services had amounted to £232. On the day of the anniversary about £116 was raised by collections, donations, profit on teas, and the various means known to Wesleyans.

IN the Central Hall, Manchester, the Rev. Arthur Moorhouse, of Didsbury College, lectured the other Sunday on The Inspiration of the Old Testament. Of various passages which we read with almost unqualified sympathy the following on Adam's Sin is one:—

What man among us can read the story of the temptation and the fall without great searchings of heart? Who can deny that it quickens the conscience and stirs the soul to its depths? Where is it possible to find words that express more fitly and impressively the divine anger at sin, the divine purpose to redeem man—for though man sinned and suffered for his sin, God did not let him alone, nor did He leave him to wage his long warfare without a hope of victory. Where, if not here, will you find words that are profitable for discipline in righteousness? It is the spiritual teaching of the passage that concerns us. The facts of the story may have been taken from a Babylonian source. The inspiration of the story is found in the way in which God directed the writer in his selection and arrangement of the facts, and still more in the use he makes of them as the vehicle of great and abiding spiritual truths. Any man who lays to heart these spiritual lessons will be a better man, more completely equipped for good living, more constantly aware of God and his true relation to God.

At the same time, we note that the same conscientious judgment which detects spiritual truth in the old Eden story is capable of detecting spiritual falsehood elsewhere—e.g., in the stories written for the glorification of the priesthood, and in the personal spite blended with lowly devotion of some of the Psalms. When the lecturer flatly and unhesitatingly denied that there was unveracity in the Bible, he made a statement that would need some qualification in the course of a tour through the Books of Chronicles. It is a thankless task to point out the defects of the Bible. Even to this hour it is an unpopular one. But if our religion is to be founded in truth we shall no more be able to contend for the uniform moral excellence of the Bible than for its scientific accuracy.

THE latest returns show a serious increase in the amount of London lunacy. The increase is not altogether a real one, because there is a tendency to send a larger number of cases of harmless senile decay for treatment. But this does not account for everything, and the Committee of the Council anticipate still larger figures in the coming year. The total of lunatics and imbeciles known to the Council, and excluding private patients, is 23,948. The distribution of cases is significant: Hampstead, healthy, and in large part well clothed and well fed, has no more than 2·1 per 1,000 of the population; in the Strand the ratio is 13·7 per 1,000. This enforces the familiar fact that lunacy is in a measure the result of destitution. These lunacy statistics are among the most disturbing that come before us, indicating as they do that the social environment is becoming more acutely destructive of the human mind; and suggestive of that larger number of people, not legally insane, but degenerate in mind and body, the wreckage, but only part of the wreckage, of our society.

THE Sustentation Fund has received a legacy of £550 (less legacy duty) from the late Mrs. Cooke, of Guildford, who for many years was one of its generous supporters.

LONG SUTTON, LINCOLNSHIRE: APPEAL.—The executive of the Eastern Union of Unitarian and other free Christian churches commends the appeal of the Long Sutton congregation for £150, needed to repair their ancient chapel, as worthy of generous support. A letter in the INQUIRER of October 22 told of this need, and reported the practical sympathy and commendation of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

CANON CHEYNE'S new volume on "Bible Problems and the New Material for their Solution,' a book of about 250 pages, is nearly ready for publication, and will be included in Messrs. Williams and Norgate's Crown Library.

THE YEAR 1902.

THE report of the Registrar-General of England and Wales for the year 1902 has recently been issued. The opening of that year found a visitation of small-pox raging in London, and the Boer War still dragging on its course. Both these inflictions ceased in the summer.

We find that 2,464 deaths from small-pox were registered in the year, of which 821 were returned as vaccinated, 791 as not vaccinated, and 852 lacked information on this point; and 22 deaths were attributed to the effects of vaccination. 2,177 out of the 2,464 deaths took place in London and its neighbourhood.

Scarlet fever has been rapidly subsiding. It is now only one-seventh part as fatal as it was thirty years ago. Nevertheless, it caused 4,875 deaths in the year 1902. Two deaths from hydrophobia occurred in 1902; there had been none during the three preceding years; 2,784 deaths were referred to the effects of alcohol. One disease induced by intemperance is called "cirrhosis of the liver," and the death-rate caused by this disease has increased during the last twenty-five years from 111 to 155 per million in the case of males, and from 74 to 115 in the case of females. Cancer continues to increase, and in 1902 caused the death of 696 per million men, and 985 per million women.

The marriages in 1902 totalled 261,750, being 2,350 more than in 1901, and the greatest number in any year except 1899; 173,011 of these were Church of England marriages. The per millage of church marriages was 661, being 5 less than in 1901, and the lowest figure yet on record. Non-church marriages totalled 88,739, being 339 per 1,000, the greatest number and the highest per millage ever recorded; 10,606 of these were Roman Catholic marriages, being 40·5 per 1,000. The Protestant Nonconformist marriages were 33,428, the per millage working out to 127 per 1,000, as against 128 in 1901. Jewish marriages were 1944, an increase of 131 over 1901, and the greatest number ever recorded, and giving the highest per millage, namely, 7·4 per 1,000. Civil marriages were 42,761, being 163 per 1,000, an increase of 1,694 on 1901, and the greatest number and the highest per millage ever recorded.

Immature marriages are said to be diminishing, but we see that 14 girls of 15 were married to husbands of ages varying from 18 to 30. Illiteracy also continues to decrease. In 1902 only 23 per 1,000 of the bridegrooms and 26 per 1,000 of the brides made marks instead of signing their names; and many of these were foreign Jews, and some foreign Roman Catholics, who had settled in the east of London. The proportion of Jewish marriages is 38·7 per cent. in the City of London, 47·2 in Mile End Old Town, and 48·3 in Whitechapel. In Whitechapel 16·5 per cent. of the husbands and 19·9 per cent. of the wives signed by mark. In Mile End Old Town the percentages were 26·2 of the husbands and 34·2 of the wives.

WE shall see that law is as sublime a revelation of the living God as are beauty and love and life itself.—G. S. Merriam.

PEASANTS' HIGH SCHOOLS FOR ADULTS.

THE Adult School Movement in our own country has an interesting parallel in Denmark, which anyone may study who will spend an Easter vacation at one of the High School Homes given in the list of Holiday Resorts issued by the Teachers' Guild. Though the schools have aroused considerable interest among teachers in this country, the only published information is still in pamphlet form, and I owe much of what follows to Mr. J. S. Thornton, B.A., who has made a special study of the subject.

The Peasants' High School is a humble residential college, with a session of five or six months, from November to March. It is attended by young men of from 16 to 25 years of age, drawn chiefly, but not exclusively, from the small yeomanry or peasant-proprietors of Denmark. There is also a summer session for young women, and it is estimated that nearly one-sixth of the rural population has passed, or is passing, through these schools. Their purpose is educational in the broader sense of the word, a sense which includes initiation into the life of fellowship and into the spiritual life of the nation. They do not aim at technical, academic, or agricultural instruction—though there are several technical and agricultural schools closely related to them—but at education pure and simple, that is to say, the awakening of the faculties of the higher life and the illumination of the mind. But that is more readily understood when we consider their origin and inception.

It is to Bishop Grundtvig (1783–1872), an able and many-sided man, and an ardent patriot, that the idea of the Peasants' High School is, in the first place, due. And it may well be in the Peasants' High School that his ardour for religious reform will bear its best fruit. When the Danes obtained a free constitution in 1834, the bishop was one of those who understood that a democracy demands more than any other form of government from the mass of its citizens. They must be trained and educated for its service; not, he thought, in Latin Grammar Schools, but in high schools of truly national inspiration, where they might be initiated into the spiritual life of their country. Writing and preaching would never suffice, for the social evangelisation of the peasantry could only be achieved by close personal intercourse. For many years he dreamed of and strove for a great Scandinavian popular university with three hundred professors, in which the mother tongue, the history of the Fatherland, the national songs, and the Scandinavian social economy, laws, and constitution should be the principal studies. But his idea was to take humbler shape, for in 1844 a Kiel professor—Professor Flor—dreading the Germanising influences then at work throughout Schleswig-Holstein, established the first Peasants' High School at Rödding, twenty years before the Prussio-Danish war. This stood alone till, in 1850, Kristian Kold, a romantic and remarkable character, established a second in the island of Funen.

Both Flor and Kold were fired by the writings of Grundtvig, and their schools carried his ideals into practice. But Kold's strong individuality is so far impressed upon the movement that I must spare him a few words. An artisan's son, he was educated for a schoolmaster; but religious difficulties intervening, he went into the East and worked as a bookbinder in Smyrna. He made the return journey from the Adriatic, wheeling his possessions before him in a barrow across Europe. He fought in the war of '48, and soon afterwards he read an historical manual of Grundtvig's which seemed to focus and explain all his thoughts and ponderings. He was seized with an insatiable desire to communicate the new light to his fellows; and in the winter of 1850 he gathered round him a group of young peasants whom he instructed in Socratic fashion. For twenty years he made his home a school, and his school a home for comrades. He began also to instruct young women during the summer months. His educational philosophy was very simple; one must arouse interest before one seeks to instruct. Bishop Grundtvig and he died near the same time (1872 and 1870), but they left the movement firmly established. As many as a hundred men during five winter months, and a hundred girls for three months in summer, had been under Kold's roof every year, and besides these he had gathered the teachers of other schools together for conference and inspiration.

Denmark lost Schleswig-Holstein in the war of 1864, and the Prussian Government refused to permit the reopening of the Rödding School. It was transferred across the new frontier to Askov, where, after 1878, it became a popular university for advanced historical studies and the training of high school teachers. The war of 1864 led to the rapid multiplication of these schools. In 1896 they numbered 65, with seven others, including agriculture in their curriculum, and another seven for purely agricultural or horticultural training. Some 6,000 men and women are, it is said, students in these schools. This represents a considerable proportion in a country whose population hardly exceeds two millions and a quarter. It is interesting to observe that they are peasants, and not townspeople, and that it is unquestionably due to these schools that Denmark has, as Bjornssen puts it, "the best educated peasantry in Europe." Nearly all the 1,100 co-operative dairies which have recently sprung up in Denmark are managed by men who have been trained in the high schools.

The object of the schools is not, as I have said, to provide a course of technical or academic instruction, but to cultivate intelligence and comradeship. At Askov the curriculum seems to lay more stress upon the acquisition of knowledge, because it is less of a primary and more of a secondary adult school—if I may employ a useful French division which assigns the development of the pupil to primary teaching, and the exposition of the subject to secondary. But at Askov as elsewhere the teaching is often conversational, and the subjects are largely of a historical or literary character, the stress being rightly laid, as Bishop Grundtvig designed, upon Scandinavian history and literature. At the same time, science is not neglected, while the theoretical and practical study of hygiene has its place. We have heard of Danish labourers reading a translation of Euripides together through the winter evenings, but it is more generally their own rich literature that they learn to study and to love.

The climatic conditions of Denmark, with its long, hard continental winter, give much leisure to the peasantry, while their land laws place a large proportion in possession of their fields. The young peasant is therefore in a position to take advantage of the high school in his neighbourhood; but even in Denmark there are the really poor who could not afford the plain living and high thinking which is offered to them for about eight or ten shillings a week. And for these, bursaries have been created, both by the government and the locality. The government has for the last ten or twelve years made a grant of about £10,000 for this specific purpose, besides giving a total sum of £7,000 a year to the principals towards the expenses of the various schools. The schools are private enterprises, and are not supervised by the State. Sometimes they belong to one man; sometimes, as at Askov, several of the teachers share in the ownership.

There seems to be no doubt about the educational success of this interesting movement. Danish butter is one of the most concrete proofs of it. And from the fellowship point of view testimony is hardly less unanimous in its favour. No class distinctions are ever allowed to separate the students from one another, or from their teachers. Youths from the poorest families are here the comrades of those whose fathers are public officials or well-to-do farmers. As in the old days when Kristian Kold slept in a great loft with his pupils, and conversation went on far into the night, so the school is a home and the life there is a family life. Nor does it lapse with the term's end; for all over Denmark there are lecture societies, gymnasia, and associations of old students, and in Copenhagen and other towns there are twenty-six high school homes or boarding-houses where they lodge and meet. These become centres of social and intellectual activity.

Two accusations appear to have been brought against the movement: that the schools teach nothing useful—a criticism we need not consider—and that they are merely centres for Grundtvigian propaganda. Even if the latter should be in any degree true, which I am far from believing, the remedy is in the hands of the critics: Let them establish schools which shall be free from any similar bias.

From Denmark, the Peasants' High School has spread into Sweden and Norway, and into the Scandinavian settlements in the United States, and everywhere it appears to have been marked by the same spirit of enlightenment and comradeship. It is one of the most interesting and hopeful experiments which any age can show, and it is earnestly to be hoped that this Grundtvigian ideal of the social education of young men and women at the most critical period of their development may find apostles in other lands as eager and as wise as Kristian Kold.

THE "HIBBERT JOURNAL."

WE welcome very heartily, with the appearance of the October number of the Hibbert Journal, the beginning of the third year of its existence. There is no need to reiterate the story of its great success. We would only say that 6,000 copies of the present number have been printed, and that nearly all are sold. More and more we believe it is winning appreciation among all schools of theological thinkers. Catholics and Anglicans, orthodox Nonconformists, and Unitarians and Agnostics find matter of interest in its pages. Without exaggeration, we believe it may be said to be one of the most important and effective instruments now in operation for the liberalising of theological thought. At the same time, it is not only creating liberal thought, it is doing something almost as important in revealing a vast amount of germinating liberal thought in many directions where it was hardly suspected. To afford an opportunity for the expression of such thought is to increase its power. We are made to realise how many, in different churches, are growing dissatisfied with the old creeds, and are seeking in various ways for some re-statement of theology in harmony with modern science and philosophy. The knowledge of this multitude of seekers and thinkers ought to stir us all to fuller energy, and brighten our efforts with a more confident hope.

The current October number is not, perhaps, one of the strongest from the point of view of scholarship or philosophical thought. But for the cultivated layman it is an eminently interesting and readable number, and we hold that the cultivated layman ought to be considered as well as the trained theologian and philosopher. We should be sorry to see articles in the Hibbert confined to those which might have appeared in Mind, or in specialistic reviews like the Zeitschrift fiir Neutestamentliche Wissenschaft. No doubt such articles are in place sometimes, but the cultivated layman and the ordinary clergyman or minister want articles dealing with religious problems in language which they can understand; they want articles which do not pre-suppose long specialised study, but which can be appreciated and enjoyed by any cultivated man or woman who gives serious attention to them. The Hibbert Journal, while it has usually contained several articles for specialists, has always recognised its duty to the far larger world of untrained thought. We certainly do not wish it to come down to the level of what is called "the man in the street," but it ought to have some real help to give to what might be described as the men in the world. We are glad that the Hibbert does recognise its duty to such men, and that it does not only appeal to the scholar in his study.

In the number before us the subject of sin looms rather large. The first three articles are concerned with it from different points of view. Sir Oliver Lodge, in the first article, replies to the Bishop of Rochester's criticism which appeared in the July number. As in most of Sir Oliver Lodge's articles, we find the revelation of a great, simple, earnest mind, which is even more interesting than the theological thoughts expressed. "My sole life ambition, so far as I know," Sir Oliver says, in words which carry conviction for all who know anything of the man, "is the harmless one of hoping to be useful to Higher Powers by expressing in act and word such thoughts of the age as have fallen to my lot." And then he goes on with pleasant irony, in reply to the Bishop's rather superior tone towards an outsider :—

The Bishop has kindly recognised this, and has given me an ample welcome into his domain. I confess that I had rather taken this welcome for granted, because if everyone, except professionally competent persons, refrain from touching a subject, that subject tends to get rather technical and dull. The atmosphere of professionalism in games and in other things may easily be overdone, and the amateur should not be wholly discouraged.

This very modest claim of a great physicist to be allowed to think for himself on matters of religion, and to have his own carefully considered thoughts treated with respect, is one which all but pedants will gladly recognise. "I think it possible," he goes on, "for the clergy to over-estimate the crudity and ignorance of the laity. A professional jargon is apt to be employed which by habit may sound appropriate on Sundays, but does not represent the mental attitude of anyone at other times. Perhaps I may unobtrusively remark that such expressions as 'righteous vengeance,' 'angry Father,' wrathful Lamb' do not seem satisfactory forms whereby to represent what the Bishop calls 'a stately and austere conception of order.'" We cannot deal here with the article as a whole, all the more as it consists of somewhat disconnected replies to separate criticisms of the Bishop's. The general aim is to find a meaning for sin and the doctrine of the Atonement which may be independent of orthodox presupposition as to the nature of Christ, and which should be in harmony with modern science and modern thought.

The third article, by a "Catholic Priest," is not in itself important. It has some interest as coming from a Roman Catholic, but, while it may contribute a little to the understanding of the Roman Catholic ideas about sin, it does not throw any particular light on the nature of sin itself.

The second article, by Professor Muirhead, is, as we should expect, interesting and important. It attempts to find, in the opposite sides presented by the Bishop and Sir Oliver Lodge, "a larger truth, which embraces the contentions of both." This is an occupation which many of our higher philosophers enjoy. Whether the antagonists whose diversities are reconciled enjoy the process so much may be doubted. It is not that they delight in differing and dislike peace, but the attitude of the reconciler, who must be supposed to see all round them both, and to think rather slightingly of the limitations of each, demands much humility in the reconciled. In some cases we have known temporary reconcilement indeed take place, but only for the purpose of a united attack upon the reconciler. The "two partial rights—two essential, though incompatible phases of religious feeling," represented by Sir Oliver Lodge and the Bishop, Professor Muirhead finds in "on the one hand, belief in the essential sanity of human nature suffering no shadow of its own inward or outward failures to stain the pure radiance of its faith in the ultimate triumph of good; and in the other the sense of overmastering evil and the need of assistance from some redeeming power beyond ourselves."

The article by Professor H. G. Smith, on "The Triumph of Erasmus," is a plea for veracity in religion. Erasmus is treated as a type of modern Broad Churchmen, or crypto-liberal Dissenters. "His strength lay in his conceptions," but his convictions were weak.

This attitude towards the great dilemmas of the day was evasive. He saw truth on both sides of every actual issue. He yielded to ecclesiastical authority for the sake, he said, of the peace of the Church, but his real motives certainly included his own peace and security.

"Luther," he goes on, "towered above him as the rugged champion of honesty and personal liberty," and then, turning from the past to the present, Professor Smith says :—

On both sides of the Atlantic, the simple ethical demands of honesty and personal liberty of conscience are being subordinated to the exigencies of institutions and denominations. These progressive forces are now resisted by the very arguments with which Erasmus and his kind opposed Protestantism as a movement in its beginning. . . If anything is clear in the pages of history it is that crypto-liberalism is not Protestant. Protestantism, as a positive moral movement, sprang from the scorn of compromise, evasion, and duplicity. . . There cannot be true progress except on the basis of veracity and sincerity.

The article is, as the above extract will suggest, a bracing and effective plea for veracity. It is this, and not particular orthodox doctrines, which is the essential characteristic of Luther and the Protestant Reformation.

An article by Mr. Wheeler on the Ten Commandments is written in a manner less common now than it was twenty years ago. There is a note almost of flippancy about it, and certainly there is not much sympathy with the time-honoured formulas considered. He begins with a sweeping statement, which marks the unecclesiastical dogmatist :—

When once a man begins that eager search for truth which drives him to examine, sanely and unemotionally, all that he holds most sacred, he soon finds that he has passed beyond the pale of even the broadest church.

This assumption, that all who really desire truth, and who pursue it sanely, must be outside even the broadest church, belongs to a type of mind which, whether it happens to call itself Roman Catholic or an enfranchised agnostic, can only be described as bigoted. The criticism on the second commandment, against idolatry, and still more the third commandment, against taking the name of the Lord in vain, is bald and inadequate. The sixth and the eighth commandments are confused with one another. Most astonishing is the criticism on the fifth and seventh commandments. Children need not show any particular care or affection for their parents unless they thoroughly deserve it. He does not even realise what even poor foolish old King Lear felt, that there is an ineradicable relationship between parents and children which no misconduct on either side can abrogate. For children to judge their parents as though they were outsiders, and did not belong to them, although the parents may be foolish and the children's judgment sane, has always been, and we hope always will be, regarded as impiety. In discussing the seventh commandment, Mr. Wheeler says :—

While it is impossible to conceive a moral code, in which lying, theft, murder, and such offences are not prohibited, it is quite conceivable that such a code might contain no reference to what is specifically dubbed "morality" in England to-day. The terms on which two people of opposite sex are to each other ought to be nobody's business but their own.

"Each man imagines," says Mrs. Humphry Ward in "David Grieve," "the matter is still for his deciding, and he can no more decide it than he can tamper with the fact that fire burns or water drowns. All these centuries the human animal has fought with the human soul, and step by step the soul has registered her victories. She has won them only by feeling for the law and finding it; uncovering, bringing into light, the firm rocks beneath her feet, and on these rocks she rears her landmarks—marriage, the family, the State, the church. Neglect them, and you sink into the quagmire from which the soul of the race has been struggling for generations to save you."

Few would now maintain that the Ten Commandments were a complete code of morality, but we cannot help thinking that they deserve from liberal thinkers a more sympathetic, more historical treatment than Mr. Wheeler gives them.

Mr. Schiller's article on "Dreams and Idealism" is, to us, the most interesting in the present number. Mr. Schiller is the chief English representative of a rebellion against the predominant orthodox philosophy of idealistic absolutism, and his enthusiasm for what he calls Humanism in philosophy is full of interest and promise. We cannot enter here upon the argument of the article. "The Absolute is an asylum ignorantiæ, who hides from view the real difficulties of the metaphysical problem." "Our ultimate assumptions cannot be proved a priori; they can only be assumed and tried." Mr. Schiller represents what he calls Pragmatism—the belief that philosophical conclusions depend on the will as well as on the intellect. Whatever may be the final conclusion as to the value of his teaching, he certainly knows how to express it in very vital, effective, and simple language.

There is no space for mention of other articles, although we should like to have referred to Professor Gardner's article on M. Loisy, and Rev. W. Manning's on "The Degrading of the Priesthood in the Church of England," but we can only say that both articles are interesting and useful. They deal with present difficulties in the Roman and Anglican Church in a liberal, living way, and are thus contributory towards the ideals and principles on which the Hibbert Journal is founded.

THE freedom of the mind, the freedom of the tongue, have been won for us by the heroes of the bygone days. Let us cherish the memories of what Englishmen have done of old, that we too may do our part in that brief day during which this sea-girt isle is ours.—R. A. Armstrong.

MUSINGS:

BY A MINISTER:

VI.

I CANNOT quite understand the objection, not to say repugnance, which some persons have to the use of catechisms. They are no ecclesiastical invention. Horace, I remember, gives a witty account of the catechising of Roman schoolboys. Instruction by set question and answer must be almost as old as the alphabet itself; write down the dialogue—say, on a clay tablet—and behold a catechism.

It is with religion, says Hooker, as with other sciences; it has its rudiments. Even terms of spiritual meaning must first be received by the understanding, and lodged in the mind; why should we not teach these elements as we teach the elements of grammar and arithmetic? Children in Scotland have the Multiplication Table printed on the back of the Shorter Catechism, and I have seen Table and Catechism coupled together in the same way in Germany. They are applications of one method.

It is the fixed formality of question and answer, I suppose, to which exception is taken. I do not see how this can be avoided. Religious knowledge is largely the knowledge of fixed facts, precepts, categories, definitions, and, for quick learning and accurate retention, there must be formal arrangement. I think I would like a child of mine to know the "fruits of the spirit" as given by St. Paul; here, in small compass, are the very essentials of practical religion. It might be of no great present value to him to be able to recite their names, but it would be of great importance to him that a foundation should be laid for future use, and it would be a strange thing that he should be able to enumerate the chief gases, or the various parts of plants, and not be able to repeat this vocabulary of his own faith. We seldom probe the ignorance of the uncatechised, and therefore we do not often realise how much below their knowledge of secular subjects their religious knowledge falls.

I am inclined to see a protective as well as a formative value in catechisms. If my child be taught out of a book in school, I at least know what he is taught; he is not at the mercy of the formless, inconsequent talk on religious subjects which sometimes passes for religious teaching. The wording of a formulary is more sober and precise than any haranguing of the moment can be, and deals with that which ought to be known, as well as with that which is pleasant to teach.

There are catechisms and catechisms. That of the English Prayer-book is made grievous by the lengthy explanations which follow the Ten Commandments and the Lord's Prayer. In the Presbyterian and Lutheran forms the exposition is broken up and distributed, and is therefore easier to learn. The Shorter Catechism is supposed to have terrors of its own, and it certainly abounds in long words, and contains over one hundred questions, but both the English and the Scottish examples are child's play compared with the larger catechisms for more advanced learners which were put forth, one in the reign of Edward VI., the other in the reign of Elizabeth. The former opens in the following portentous fashion:—

Thus then beginneth the master to appose his scoler.

Master. Sith I know (dear sonne) that it is a great part of my deutie, not only to se that thou bee instructed in good letters: but also earnestly and diligently to examin what sort of religion thou followest in this thy tender age: I thought it best to oppose thee by certain questions, to the intent I may perfectly knowe, whether thou hast wel or ill trauailed therin. Now therfore tel me (my sonne) what religion that is which thou professest.

Dean Nowell's Catechism, largely founded on the other, was written in Latin, with a twofold object, as the author quaintly explains in his preface: ut Latinitatem pariter atque pietatem uno eodem labore pueri nostri addiscere possent. It is a learned treatise of great length, fully furnished with Scripture proofs; full also of courteous phrasing put into the mouths of master and scholar, and intended to set them on the happiest footing, one with the other.

If the objection be not so much to formula as to authoritative formula, there are unauthorised catechisms, like those of Dr. Watts, which may be taken as types, if not as models. A manual of elementary knowledge, as a basis for further instruction, ought not to be hard to make. Who should have the making of it I do not take it upon me to say.

MR. FARRINGTON'S FAREWELL.

THE Rev. Silas Farrington last Sunday concluded his ministry at the Ormond road Free Church, Richmond, and at the same time his fifty years of active service, first in America, and since 1872 in this country, as a minister of religion.

The text of his morning sermon was from Rom. v. 4: "Experience worketh hope." Here was a man, said Mr. Farrington, who knew what he was talking about. A worn, battered, often-defeated man, regarded by the leaders of his day as a false teacher, a dangerous innovator, to whom, nevertheless, after the Master himself, the triumph of Christianity was chiefly due. "Tribulation," Paul declared, "worketh patience; and patience, experience; and experience, hope." What was the secret of his unconquerable hope? It had two roots: first, the wonderful activity of his strenuous life; he never sat down to lament a failure, but was always pressing forward; and, second, his intense conviction of God and the constant Divine activity in the world. So we also must find this abiding ground of all hope.

If we think only of what we ourselves are doing, and see how ill-judged some of our efforts have been, or, if well judged, so imperfectly carried out or thwarted by causes we could not control, it is not easy to be hopeful. Nor is it so when we are looking upon the greater movements of the world, where there is so much confusion, and our vision is too limited to give us ground for hope. But if we steady ourselves on the higher will and purpose of God, and remember the infinite range of His providence, then hope still thrives with us, and becomes the settled and animating temper of our souls, and we can take up Paul's word: "If God be for us, who can be against us? Yea, in all things we are more than conquerors."

Taking the experience of his own fifty years of ministry as an illustration of this truth, Mr. Farrington referred to the early hopes with which he entered on the work. Then it seemed to him in New England as if all the world must soon be Unitarian. Eager to preach the simple theology and the juster conception of human life and duty it implied, he looked forward to the rapid spread of Unitarian congregations. His watchword might have been, "God is great, and Channing is His prophet." But those early hopes had not been realised. Unitarian churches had not multiplied as was expected. Yet, looking back over fifty years, he saw that the changes then hoped for would have been insignificant compared with what had really taken place. The ideas which they then thought their own had now overflowed the whole world. God had now given something far greater to their hopes. And so in looking upon the course of events in the great world, which often did not run upon the lines they had laid down. It was hard to see peaceful progress broken up by forces they could not understand, yet in time they found the Divine purpose working through, and once more they could feel with Paul "Experience worketh hope." As a final word, Mr. Farrington repeated Clough's verses of steadfast faith and hope:—

Say not the struggle nought availeth,
The labour and the wounds are vain,
The enemy faints not, nor faileth,
And as things have been they remain.

For while the tried waves, vainly breaking,
Seem here no painful inch to gain,
Far back, through creeks and inlets making,
Comes silent, flooding in, the main.

And not by eastern windows only,
Where daylight comes, comes in the light,
In front, the sun climbs slow, how slowly,
But westward, look! the land is bright.

At the evening service Mr. Farrington preached again the first sermon which he preached in the Ormond-road Church. At the conclusion of the service the farewell presentation was made, of which a brief report will be found under "News from the Churches." We are glad to hear that the two sermons are to be printed, so that friends may have this memento of the close of a ministry which has been rich in blessing to many lives.

ON Friday week the Bicentenary of the death of John Locke, on Oct. 28, 1704, was celebrated by the British Academy at Burlington House. The Master of Balliol presided over the meeting, and the secretary read two papers, the writers of which were unable to be present. The first, by Professor Campbell Fraser, was on "Locke as a Factor in Modern Thought," the second, by Sir Frederick Pollock, on "Locke's Theory of the State." Professor Campbell Fraser coupled together Locke's "Essay on the Human Understanding" and Bacon's "Instauratio" as the two most memorable works in English philosophy. Locke gave a great impulse to the analysis of human experience, and at the same time diffused the spirit of free inquiry and universal toleration.

MR. ARMSTRONG'S LECTURES.

THE fifth of Mr. Armstrong's Lectures at Northampton, on Tuesday, was devoted to the teachings of two prophets of "Pure Theism"—Francis William Newman and Theodore Parker. Using "Phases of Faith" as an "Apologia," the lecturer traced the stages through which the heretical brother of the famous Cardinal passed on his way from the strictest Calvinism to a simple, beautiful, and satisfying Theism; in that journey he discovered that essential religion was a certain sentiment towards God, and not a set of theological opinions. The religion of Newman was set forward in "Theism," and "The Soul." In the latter work the soul was considered with the same elaborate particularising concerning its various properties, attributes, and activities, as is customary with authors who deal with matters purely physical. The sense of awe, the presence of the mysterious and the sublime, expanded to the infinite are the beginnings of religion; experiences of beauty and of love develop a passion for that Being with whom we are conscious of spiritual affinity. Notwithstanding the philosophic difficulty presented in the problem of evil the soul feels that God is good, and is in personal relationship with itself. Prayer gives evidence that love proceeds not only from man to God, but from God to man.

Newman saw that what is often described as a feminine trait—the love of dependence, must be well-developed in the soul that would know its own highest possibilities, and he used the old metaphor of "marriage" to symbolise the perfect union of our soul with the Soul. The work as an argument is only for those who have had experiences similar to those described or admit their validity, but to others, if there are any, there is an appeal in the very beauty of the ideas expressed, and homage should be paid to the pure and gentle spirit who could so conceive of the relation of the soul to God.

The "Discourse on Matters pertaining to Religion" was Theodore Parker's religious manifesto. It sets out by demonstrating that there is a religious principle in man testified to by all history and by personal experience; the sense of dependence, which is part of our religious conception, infers an object on which dependence rests: we all have an idea of God, that in itself is true, while our conceptions (pictures) of God are as varied as our circumstances, and always fall infinitely short of the original. Religion is in its essence a sense of dependence on God and a willing obedience to his law; religion is thus everywhere one and the same, while theologies vary and improve according as men clarify and make more sublime their conceptions of the Eternal. Religion and fear make superstition, religion and hate make fanaticism, religion and love make solid piety. After considering Parker's theory of Inspiration and his testimony concerning Prayer, Mr. Armstrong concluded his lecture by defending the great teacher and reformer from the charge of Pantheism, and claimed that through his works, which when written were far in advance of even the "advanced" religious thought of his day—"he being dead yet speaketh."

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

IN ancient Rome, on one of the Seven Hills, stood the Capitol. It was a very sacred place, for on it were three temples—to Jupiter, and Juno, and Minerva; and there were fine statues and much treasure there, of art and papers and books.

In the year 390 before Christ the Gauls had invaded the country and captured Rome, all but the Capitol, which still stood unconquered on its hill above the enemy; but they were close up to its walls, and were determined to take it.

The garrison up in the Capitol were thought by the Gauls to be quite cut off from all around them. The walls were high, and the enemies guarded them securely from below. But one night a man undertook to climb down the almost upright face of a wall of rock, which was supposed to be as impossible to climb as if it were a wall: he took a message to the Romans who were not inside, contriving to slip through the besieging Gauls, and to bring back an answer; but when he was climbing up the rock again he was seen by the Gauls. Then they saw that there was a possible way of getting up into the Capitol in secret, and they determined to try that means of taking it.

So in the darkness of the night they began stealthily to climb, in perfect silence, up and up by the little ledges of rock, and holding on as best they could.

It was all quite quiet, and the Romans believed that they were quite safe; they had no idea that their messenger had been seen, and the secret of that entrance found out. The sentinels were asleep.

But suddenly, on the silence of the night, broke a loud discordant sound. It was the cackling of some geese which were in the citadel, dedicated to the Goddess Juno. The geese became aware of the climbing men coming nearer and nearer, and raised a cry. All the Romans rushed to their arms; Marcus Manlius was the first to reach the place of danger. Two of the Gauls had reached the top; one of them Manlius killed with his sword, and the other he thrust back over the edge of the rock with his shield. The other Romans joined in the defence; and the Gauls were flung back, and the Capitol was saved.

But what a near thing it was! and all the success was owing to the poor silly geese giving the alarm. The Romans nearly lost all because they were too confident and did not watch.

This story is told in Roman history. But see what an excellent parable it is for us. We have all got a capitol or citadel—a sacred place where our best treasures are stored. There, as in the temples in the Roman Capital the gods of the Romans dwelt, our God has His abode within us; and we must guard our citadel as they should have guarded theirs. There are enemies below in the plain, who are watching for a chance to get in. What are they? They are temptations; they lie in wait for an unguarded moment. These are idleness, ill-temper, selfishness, laziness, greediness, anger, jealousy, and all the other difficulties and sins that beset our lives and besiege us. Do we not all know how they come upon us unawares? We had thought that we were proof against them, that our defences were strong and that we had watchmen keeping guard, and so we were not ready. Our watchmen had fallen asleep, and the enemy crept stealthily up to the very entrance before we knew. Happy are we if we can leap to our feet in time to meet him at the gate and thrust him back! Too often the enemy finds us unprepared, and enters; we give way to him—to the temptation—the passion has its way, and all that is left to us when we are conquered is bitter repentance that we were so unprepared. "If only I had known I would not have yielded." But that is just what never happens; we never do know. In one of his parables Jesus shows that he understands that feeling. He says: "If the master of the house had known in what watch (that is, at what time) the thief was coming he would have watched, and would not have suffered his house to be broken through. Therefore, be ye also ready." We are too confident; we do not believe in our own weakness. Remember how Peter said, "Even if I must die with thee, yet will I not deny thee"; and most truly he meant it; but you know how bitterly he learned his lesson, and found that in a moment of temptation and weakness he had done what could never be undone.

But sometimes, like Manlius, we are awakened just in time, and only when we have conquered, discover how near we have been to a defeat.

Awake my soul! lift up thine eyes;
See where thy foes against thee rise,
In long array, a numerous host;
Awake my soul! or thou art lost.

GERTRUDE MARTINEAU.

THE SWALLOW IS GONE.

THE swallow is gone, but the robin is singing,
Brown is the bracken, red-berried the rose;
The beeches, their crimson and golden leaves flinging,
Spangle the meadow where greenest it grows.
Down, down come the acorns, so plump and so glossy;
Up starts the thrush from the turf to the tree;
And sunshine is gleaming on birchen boles mossy,
Sunshine in plenty, for you and for me.

The swallow is gone, but the skylark is left us—
See him, and hear him, aloft in the blue!
He says, if of courage the years have bereft us,
Still there is Sunshine for me and for you.
So now, when the ivy is starry with blossom,
Now in November's the time to be gay—
To keep a wee birdie atune in the bosom,
Singing as sweet as on Midsummer Day.

LET THE PEOPLE KNOW.

IN this day of multitudinous sixpenny reprints and other cheap literature of popular appeal, we are very glad that the British and Foreign Unitarian Association is not content to stand aside, but is making an attempt by this ready means to put some of our best books into the hands of the people. A sixpenny "People's Edition" of Mr. ARMSTRONG'S "GOD and the Soul" was the first volume to be issued, and those who remember the closing passage of that "Essay towards Fundamental Religion" will recognise the special fitness with which Professor ESTLIN CARPENTER'S study of "The First Three Gospels" comes next. A third volume, FRANCIS NEWMAN'S well-known Essay on "The Soul," with a new Introduction by Professor UPTON, is in the press, and others will doubtless follow.

How far the attempt may succeed it is too soon to say. Whether or not the public, which is eager for popular works of destructive criticism, will be persuaded to attend to these other voices or will have patience to follow out their earnest reasonings on the deepest questions of religious life and the true interpretation of religious literature, it is right that the offer should be made; and there must, at any rate, be many thousands of serious, inquiring minds to whom such guidance would be an unspeakable boon if only it could be brought home to them. In our own Churches, also, this is an opportunity of which the full advantage should be taken, in reading circles, in ministers' classes, in postal mission efforts, in every form of friendly emulation in the sharing of good things. The expenditure of a few shillings in every congregation throughout the country and in the many homes where thoughtful, earnest people are, and shillings can be used to such good unselfish purpose, will go far to scatter this precious seed "broadcast o'er the land." And, indeed, it must be done by some such personal effort to have its full effect. We may fairly ask every one who knows the value of these books to miss no opportunity of letting other people know.

The issue of Mr. CARPENTER'S "First Three Gospels" in this edition might seem the very extravagance of missionary zeal. Here is a substantial volume of 350 pages, admirably printed, which can now be bought at Essex Hall for 4½d. And it is not merely a cheap reprint of the original work published fourteen years ago; it is a new edition,* thoroughly revised, and, while certain sections are omitted, there is a new and most valuable concluding chapter of sixty pages, showing the general results of the critical study of the Gospels which has preceded, estimating their historical value, and then passing to a sketch of the "historical JESUS." The rest of this article we propose to devote to the new features of Mr. CARPENTER'S book.

The original work had ten chapters and an appendix on "The Term 'Son of Man' in the Synoptic Gospels." The new edition has a brief Introduction and eight chapters, of which the last, as we have said, is entirely new. The Introduction takes the place of the original first chapter on "The Gospels and early Christian Literature." The second chapter, on the relation of the First Three Gospels to the Fourth (on which there is a chapter in Mr. CARPENTER'S larger work on "The Bible in the Nineteenth Century"), and the chapter on "The Coming of the Son of Man" and the appendix, are omitted, though a section on the Transfiguration is transferred to another place. Thus after the Introduction, the new edition begins at once with "The Formation of the Gospel Traditions," and after chapters on "The Messianic Idea," "The Messiah's Career," and "The Miracles," passes to the separate study of the Three Gospels, in as many chapters. These seven chapters are a reprint from the earlier edition, but thoroughly revised and with fresh notes added, referring to the most recent literature on the subject.

It is, however, to the concluding chapter that readers who have long been familiar with this work and know its great value will turn with the keenest interest. "The First Three Gospels and their Historical Value" is its general heading, but thirty-seven of its sixty pages are devoted to a sketch of "The Historical JESUS." Before coming to this substantive part of his work, Mr. CARPENTER touches upon certain recent suggestions concerning "JESUS as a Creation of Myth," and on "The External Evidence," and "Traditions in the Talmud," with ample reference to Mr. TRAVERS HERFORD'S book.

* A Library Edition, on thicker paper and cloth bound, is also issued. "The First Three Gospels, their Origin and Relations," by J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A. Third edition. Philip Green, 5, Essex Street, Strand, W.C. 3s. 6d.

That the historical JESUS cannot be resolved into myth save by the most reckless and uncritical dealing with facts, Mr. CARPENTER makes abundantly clear. When the Gospel records have been thoroughly scrutinised, and much that they contain rejected as belonging to the realm of imagination, JESUS of Nazareth remains, as the personal source of that great impulse of new life without which Paul and the early Church cannot be explained. "What meets us in the Gospels, and in the early literature of the Church, is not so much novelty of teaching, in the sense of the announcement of truths unknown before, but newness of being, originality of character, a fresh outlook upon the world, an unexpected demand for action, a loftier hope for man, a closer walk with God."

Mr. CARPENTER then pictures, briefly but vividly, the career of JESUS, bringing out the chief features of his teaching, his prophetic character, his proclamation of the coming kingdom, the great conviction which ultimately mastered him that he was the Messiah of his people, and the tragic ending of his life. Mr. CARPENTER leaves the "resurrection," as Dr. MARTINEAU does in the concluding chapter of his "Seat of Authority," as belonging rather to the history of the Church; but the last moments of JESUS on the cross he interprets not as overcome with despair, but endured with unconquerable faith.

This chapter will receive, we are sure, the most careful study from many readers, and we must not dwell further here upon any special points, but, in conclusion, will quote two passages of the deepest interest, describing the final result of this examination of the history and its bearing upon our personal religious life :—

"The Gospel, then, is the vehicle of a mighty impulse for the renovation of human life. It demands of the disciple an unwearied service; it sends him forth to seek and to save the lost; rescue from degradation, recovery out of weakness, deliverance from debasing passions and infirmity of will, elevation above despondency and hopelessness, vision for blindness, light upon ignorance, and sympathy upon sorrow, these have been its perpetual watchwords. JESUS had no idea of the social order as we are slowly learning to understand it. Of the vastness of the world, the great procession of its nations, the immense developments of modern industrial enterprise, the instruments which science has put into our hands for calling the powers of nature to the aid of human skill, he knew nothing. Yet all that we call progress, in the attainment of knowledge, in the advance of social justice, in the slow effort—even now little more than a dream in the hearts of a few—to knit the nations together in the bond of peace, rightfully belongs to him. All this is part of the great hope of the 'kingdom of God.' It does not determine the forms of the social order towards which we are moving. That is the business of science, not prophecy; it must be achieved out of the laborious processes of experience; there is no short cut to the re-organisation of life. What JESUS has done is to give force and vitality to a great ideal; to present that ideal so that it may itself expand and develop with the movement of the years; to kindle such joy in it that life is, as it were, new-made, when it is steadily discerned and loyally followed; to link it with the loftiest of our conceptions alike of the present and the future. Watchfulness and endeavour, trust and love, are his demands. For those who strive to see eye to eye with him, the key to the entire development of man lies in the words, 'Be ye perfect, as your Father which is in heaven is perfect.' They are content to wait for God to complete the education which he has here begun."

And this is Mr. CARPENTER's final word:

"The return to the historical JESUS will involve much sifting of time-honoured beliefs, much readjustment of the perspectives of the future. Many elements, once thought vital to faith, will gradually fall away and disappear. The entire cycle of Messianic conceptions will pass out of the sphere of religion, and cease to prescribe the patterns of our hope. In a larger and more ancient universe than ever JESUS knew, we shall not expect him to reappear in our skies, roll back the deeps of our seas, and draw forth from the earth the reanimate forms of the uncounted dead. The doctrines belonging to the old order which have established themselves in the so-called Apostles' Creed, from the virgin-birth to the resurrection of the body, will one by one lose their vitality, and cease to control the faith of those who understand the processes which gave them shape. Ecclesiastical Christianity may be shaken; but the religion of JESUS will be untouched. Then, as of old, men will still learn of him to say 'Our Father.' Then, as of old, with a wider outlook and a fuller knowledge, may it be also with as deep a love and trust, they will repeat his prayer,

> Thy Kingdom come, Thy will be done
> As in heaven, so on earth."

THE NATIONAL TRUST'S APPEAL.

WE are glad that Miss OCTAVIA HILL should appeal in these columns for help in carrying out the great undertaking of the National Trust to secure Gowbarrow Fell, Aira Force, with its lovely glen and a mile of the shore of Ullswater, as a national possession, and we commend her letter to the earnest attention of our readers.

Three years ago the Brandlehow estate on Derwentwater was secured, and generous friends of the National Trust have made other beautiful gifts to the people; but this last undertaking is the greatest of all. Barras Head cost £500, Ide Hill £1,600, Brandlehow £6,500. Gowbarrow is to cost £12,000, of which £7,000 has still to be given. We cannot too much admire the splendid courage with which Miss HILL and other friends have determined to secure this great boon for the people, and her faith that the money will be given. Writing in July to the Spectator, Miss HILL told how, on this very land, which is now to be made free for all time to all comers, WORDSWORTH wrote his poem on the daffodils. And she added: "I hope in the years to come those of us who have helped to preserve and dedicate to the many, free open fell, cool, wooded glen, waterfall, lake shore, and hillside, may have visions and memories like him who sang:—

> Oft, when on my couch I lie,
> In vacant or in pensive mood,
> They flash upon that inward eye
> Which is the bliss of solitude;
> And then my heart with pleasure fills,
> And dances with the daffodils."

We live just now in troubled times, and are drawing near to a winter which, we sadly forebode, will bring much suffering and trial for the poor. And yet we cannot lose faith in our country or our people, and every time is good to be doing something to make our country more beautiful, because its purest beauty is secured as a possession for all alike. "Man does not live by bread alone, and the need of quiet and beauty," Miss HILL says in her letter, "is each year felt more and more by the thousands who spend their daily life in large cities." She wrote on All Souls' Day, a festival of rejoicing in the thought of universal brotherhood, the day of intercession for souls in prison. And what she asks of those who can make humble or great gifts is an act of faith and love, that shall help to deliver souls imprisoned in narrow, dreary circumstances and unlovely places, to make them sharers to this fresh extent of what is loveliest in England, and to enrich our people's life, in the hearts both of givers and receivers, by this treasure added to the common store.

The National Trust, of which PRINCESS LOUISE is President, has its office at 25, Victoria-street, Westminster, S.W., and Mr. NIGEL BOND is the secretary. Miss OCTAVIA HILL and Sir JOHN BRUNNER are both members of the Council, and Canon Rawnsley is Honorary Secretary.

ON the throne of the universe, Lord of life and death, and joy and sorrow, there sits Goodness itself, goodness unfading, unalterable; never wearied with our misery, or disgusted by our failures; but loving us all, the saint and the sinner, with one infinite all-embracing love.—Frances Power Cobbe.

SET forth the great moral purpose of Christianity, always teaching that Christ came to deliver from the power still more than from the punishment of sin; that his most important operation is within us; and that the highest end of his mission is the erection of God's throne in the soul, the inspiration of a fervent filial piety, a piety founded in confiding views of God's parental character, and manifested in a charity corresponding to God's unbounded and ever-active love.—Channing.

THE REV. CHARLES HARGROVE'S MISSION TO AUSTRALASIA.

LETTERS EN ROUTE.

XI.—WELLINGTON, CHRISTCHURCH, AND DUNEDIN.

Dunedin, N.Z., September, 1904.

MY last letter was written on the way to Wellington, where we arrived after dark, and were met at the station by Sir Robert Stout, Chief Justice of New Zealand, and Mr. Stephens, the able and energetic secretary of the committee for my reception. There has never been a Unitarian congregation here, though Judge Richmond conducted services in his drawing room, for members of his family and connections, for the space of twenty years, and there are many others who have adhered to the faith which they learnt in the Old Country, and have brought up their children in the knowledge of their parents' religion. Indeed, I have been surprised and gratified to meet or hear of Unitarians in far out-of-the-way places, who get THE INQUIRER, or Christian Life, sent to them regularly by friends at home, and, after twenty, or twice twenty years, that they have never had an opportunity of attending public worship conducted after their own mind, still keep the name and belief, and know all about our controversies and affairs in England. I find that according to the census of 1896, before the Church at Auckland was founded, there were 375 persons who returned themselves as "Unitarians." The number had increased in 1901 to 468, of whom 283 were males and 185 females. This disproportion of the sexes indicates no doubt that women, feeling their need of religious communion more than men, and failing to find it among those of their own way of thinking, had joined other churches. There is no such disproportion among the more popular denominations. The Baptists number considerably more women than men among their adherents, as do the Brethren and the Salvation Army. The Anglican, Presbyterian, and Roman Catholic have more men, but this is accounted for by the excess of men over women in the total population, there being only 90 women to 100 men.

Many interesting problems arise from the examination of these statisticts, but what I would specially draw attention to is the wide field open for a Unitarian Mission, without any sectarian attempt to draw away the adherents of other churches. There were over 8,000 persons who returned themselves as Free Thinkers, Agnostics, Theists, or "No Denomination," and 1,000 as "No Religion." To such as these, and probably to most of the 18,000 who refused to state their belief, Unitarianism might make an appeal as an entirely free and rational religion. We have here the opportunity which circumstances did not allow us in England of establishing ourselves on a basis neither offensive nor defensive in respect of other religions bodies, but simply offering a form of religion which would commend itself to many who cannot commit themselves to the orthodox creeds.

At Wellington I conducted service, and preached on two Sundays, and I hope to get in another on my way Northward again. The audience was not large, but it was eminently "respectable," in the good old-fashioned and correct sense of the word —not a quarter of the number whom I addressed at some other places, but worth much more, as cultivated, thoughtful, old, and esteemed residents.

I arrived at Christchurch, founded to be a stronghold of Episcopalianism, in pouring rain, and it rained all day and at night, too, during my short visit. Two students of the University, Mr. Toogood and Mr. Williams, were the whole committee to arrange for my reception and lectures, and the result showed how much can be done by even two, when they are really interested and anxious for the success of the cause for which they have volunteered their services. The rain was falling fast when I started—an unknown man—to give my first lecture, "The Message of Unitarianism." The advertisements had been scanty, for economy had to be borne in mind, and I was quite prepared to find a dozen gathered to listen to me. Indeed, I should have been well satisfied, for is it not an honour for any man if a dozen of his fellows are ready to put themselves to some personal inconvenience and expense to hear what he has to say to them? But I found five times that number present; and on the following night, when the weather was yet more contrary, about the same number came in the wet, dark night to hear me speak of "Unitarianism: its Spirit and its Doctrines." I was obliged to leave the next morning, but may contrive to stop there next week under more favourable conditions.

Dunedin.—I am sitting on a volcanic hill overlooking the city. Below me is a level isthmus, not half a mile wide, which separates the Pacific Ocean from the Otago Harbour, a sound or fiord some twelve miles in depth. On the one side the breakers roll their foam up the sandy beach, on the other the marsh left by the tide stretches to the shallow waters which deepen towards the quay. Everywhere, thickly crowding the narrow plain and climbing the hills, are cottages, large and small, built for the most part of wood, with roofs of corrugated iron, which, when painted a dull red, has a very good appearance, and, painted or plain, keeps the storm rain out better than any tiles. Beyond the bay is the city with Anglican and Roman Cathedrals, and, more imposing than either, the "First Presbyterian Church," for the early settlers were Scotch, and brought their minister and working plans, doors and windows, and other fittings for a church with them, and set apart the first site in the city they were founding for religious worship. The electric cars speed to and fro through the broad ways, the trains run North and South, and to the suburbs; there are two daily newspapers, like almost all I have seen in this part of the world, ably and respectably conducted; Courts of Justice, college, high school, everything which goes to the perfection of a modern self-contained city. It is wonderful to think that when I was a little boy at school—from the muddy shore up and over the hills which surround the site on every side but that of the narrow sea channel and the marsh which formed its southern boundary, far as the eye could compass—was one great ocean of forest, over whose vast expanse not one break could be seen. Trees and shrubs of many varieties were knitted together by long and strong creepers, entwining and entangling the whole into what seemed a thicket planted expressly to prevent intrusion. Here they landed on March 23, 1848, and, with prayer and perseverance, set to work to subdue forest and torrent, and swamp and sea; they made pasture for their flocks where the thicket had covered up the land; they filled the creeks up by cutting down the steeper hills; they ran roads and built warehouses where the tide had flowed to and fro for ages over mud and rock; they drained the marsh to make room for the growing city; they made channels to control the torrents. And now Dunedin sits enthroned as a queen among her own subject mountains, and ships from the ends of the world unload and load again at her quays. The story is quite a common one here, and yet seems to me so marvellous that I am almost prepared to hear that I have been mistaken, that it was a thousand years ago the first ship's crew landed, and that many generations have contributed to the great achievement. So, indeed, they have, but in another place. Our forefathers, who knew nothing of this far-off island, were working, contriving, fighting, thinking for its prosperity and peace. Dunedin was built in Edinburgh, Christchurch, in Canterbury. It is the old country which has reclaimed the new, and peopled it with its own sons and daughters.

I suppose I have been led to say so much of this city, while I have left the story of others no less interesting untouched, partly because I happen to write from it; more I think because I have little to say of it from the point of view of my own special mission. This is the only place at which no preparation was made for my visit. I had an introduction to one gentleman, who received me courteously, and gave me some assistance in securing a hall. But I found out afterwards that he was a lay-reader of the Church of England, and could not be expected to take any active interest in my proceedings. The friends who have extended to us the kindliest hospitality are near relatives of Mrs. Hargrove, but they too are indifferent on the subject of Unitarianism. My hostess's father, now many years deceased, was of old time a member of Mr. Fox's congregation at South-place Chapel, and, when a resident at Stawell in Victoria, conducted service regularly, first in his own house, and then at a public hall. This was kept up for perhaps twenty years, and was so successful that a minister or lecturer was engaged, but he turned out to be a spiritualist, and the congregation became divided, and was brought to an end. This is one of the dangers which beset the new movement. I have neither the right nor the wish to say anything in disparagement of either spiritualists or theosophists, but while it is quite free for Unitarians to belong to either organisation, it is absolutely essential to the success of our cause that the minister who represents our faith should keep himself free from the advocacy of what is sure to be repugnant to many who agree with him on the broader grounds of Christian Theism.

I engaged the hall recommended to me, which provided accommodation for four or five hundred, though I should have preferred a smaller one, and advertised meetings for Sunday evenings and two week nights. I could get no help with the music, so contented myself with a religious lecture on the Sunday to an audience of about thirty. One of the lectures was on Emerson, and this was very well reported in both of the daily papers, but no notice was taken of what I said on the distinctively religious subjects, nor did I on any occasion have an audience of more than forty. These were no doubt all more or less interested, and I had some inquiries for literature, but I have not met anyone as yet who professes himself a Unitarian.

I leave here after a visit to the Lakes, and shall, I hope, be able to do some more work at Christchurch and Wellington, and then spend a last week before bidding good-bye to Australasia with the dear folk at Auckland. On October 14 we sail for San Francisco, where we should arrive on the 31st. My passage across America must be somewhat hurried, but not, I trust, so much so but that I may be able to make acquaintance with the Unitarian brethren of the Far West, and renew my memory of Eastern friends. CHARLES HARGROVE.

LABOUR BUREAUX.

THE Labour Registry Committee of the Manchester City Council was disappointed in the result of the recent conference with Poor Law Guardians, promoted by them with a view to petitioning the Local Government Board for a subsidy in dealing with the unemployed in the coming winter. The Guardians being indisposed to co-operate, the City Council is preparing to act alone. A scheme is suggested for providing work for six hundred heads of families in breaking up old street setts, at present at the tramway works. As soon as there is a prospect of finding work for any considerable number of the unemployed it is intended to reopen the Labour Bureau, but with a residental qualification of twelve months instead of three.

At Leeds a municipal Labour Bureau has worked well during the six months for which it has been open. It has found employment for five thousand people. So large a number could be employed because there were considerable public works in progress. The Town Clerk of Leeds considers that so much could not always be done, and that the question of the unemployed should be treated as a national instead of a municipal problem. In this he agrees with the ideas of the Manchester Committee.

Glasgow has had a Corporation Labour Bureau for six years, and has added a Registry for Domestic Servants. Last year, out of 3,720 males who registered, work was found for only 430; while out of 2,153 females 1,805 obtained employment. No charge is made to either employers or employed for the use of the bureau. The cost has been about £250 a year, covered by a grant from the Corporation.

A general system of well-managed Municipal Labour Bureaux might prove a useful gauge of the state of employment, and a valuable auxiliary to national or local efforts to minimise the evils resulting from slackness of employment.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The Editor is not responsible for the opinions expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME; and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the sender.]

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

SIR,—As it is probable that the majority of your readers are either supporters of Manchester College, or interested in its proceedings, I venture to ask room for a short statement respecting it. I received this morning an anonymous pamphlet, professing to emanate from the forty-five trustees who signed a recent requisition. In that pamphlet it is stated that Mr. Addis "was occupying the College pulpit in his turn, though it was his own declared wish to be relieved from the duty." This was news to me, though I am responsible for filling the pulpit. Although I am not named, the obvious implication is that I compelled Mr. Addis to do what, if he had been left to his own good taste, he would not have done. In my ignorance of this dark transaction I thought it best to ask Mr. Addis himself, and he at once said that the statement was not true. I think, therefore, that the forty-five gentlemen have laid themselves open to a little kindly remonstrance; for it is certainly unusual to certify what is considered to be a damaging statement against one's neighbour when the statement is not true, and the plea that they were misinformed, if it be made, is hardly an adequate excuse.

I cannot speak of the relations of Mr. Holden to the committee; but his case came first before me, and I can only say at present that the correspondence with me conveys a totally different impression from the statement in the pamphlet. Another statement is that "there is no known instance of a bursary or exhibition being given to a Church of England student." This was not known to the forty-five; but it was well known to others. Mr. Oliver was in receipt of a bursary, and all through his course professed to belong to the Church of England. Further, the Daniel Jones Fund is referred to as though it were a College fund. If the forty-five trustees think so, they are quite mistaken; and as one of the trustees of that fund I doubt whether I could feel justified in giving any portion of it to Manchester College if the proposed resolution were proved to be valid.

We have heard much of the "open mind." I hope I have said sufficient to induce all friends of the College to keep an open mind till the special meeting of trustees assembles. At that meeting I shall be quite prepared to give an account of my stewardship, and to vindicate the position of my dear and trusted friend, Mr. Addis. JAMES DRUMMOND.

Oxford, Nov. 2.

SIR,—Will you allow us to explain that signing the Requisition asking for the special meeting of the trustees of Manchester College, Oxford, does not imply readiness to vote for any particular resolution subsequently drawn up to be submitted to that meeting? Speaking for ourselves, we would say that we signed the Requisition because we believed it was time that a meeting should be called to publicly discuss matters that were being privately discussed to an extent and in a manner most prejudicial to the best interests of the College. But we are not prepared to vote for a resolution which is regarded as an expression of want of confidence in the College management, still less is it our wish to do anything contrary to the free teaching and free learning which is the fundamental principle of the College. We wish for a recognition of the fact that the College is mainly supported as a place for training ministers for free pulpits, and desire that nothing inconsistent with this main purpose should be allowed, and we think that if the College funds are used in aid of a church that is creed-bound this must necessarily be a violation of the fundamental principle of the College. We earnestly hope that our fellow-trustees will come to the meeting with an open mind, prepared to do their best to find some settlement of the questions at issue in which all, or at any rate, the great majority of the trustees can concur.

ULLSWATER AND THE NATIONAL TRUST.

SIR,—I am anxious to bring before your readers the very important scheme for preserving 700 acres of land on Ullswater for the enjoyment of the public in perpetuity. The National Trust for the Preservation of Places of Historic Interest and Natural Beauty has the option of purchase. Nearly £5,000 of the £12,000 needed has been secured, and it is most important that the remaining £7,000 should be obtained lest this great opportunity of bestowing a priceless boon on the people of England should be lost.

The land skirts the lake for fully a mile, so preserving access for boating and opportunities for wandering by the edge of the water—a privilege more and more curtailed as country houses are built on the lakes. From the shore the land rises to 1,500 feet, a lovely slope of forest glade, moor, and rocks, commanding magnificent views of the mountains at the head of the lake. This group forms the subject of one of Turner's loveliest pictures. The wooded ravine of the Aira, with the waterfall so dear to tourists, and well known to all from Wordsworth's lines, is comprised in the proposed purchase. The whole 700 acres forms as beautiful a space of land, for the landless many of all classes to wander over and rejoice in, as can be found in our Island.

Gifts, large or small, can be sent to Canon Rawnsley at Keswick, to the Secretary of the National Trust, or to me, and all who send may know that their contributions meet those of many others. Donations reach us from rich and poor, young and old, from near and from far, from Shanghai, Simla, and the Rocky Mountains, from factory workers, from the old whose solemn memories are linked with its beauties, and from the young who hope to see the place. The sum is a very large one to get together, but the willing help of many will, I hope, accomplish the great work, and we shall dedicate to the people for their rest, refreshment, and inspiration a slope of lake-shore unrivalled in beauty.

I trust that this opportunity will not be lost, but that each will send what he can. Man does not live by bread alone, and the need of quiet and beauty is each year felt more and more by the thousands who spend their daily life in large cities.

One gentleman, in sending a donation towards the Ullswater purchase, wrote with gratitude of a day spent at Brandlehow, the estate on Derwentwater bought by the National Trust a few years back and dedicated to the public. This donor has lived all his life in the neighbourhood, yet, he adds, "I enjoyed the day the more from the knowledge that I had a right to be there—a feeling I never in my life before have had on the shores of Derwentwater."

To give the peace of assured enjoyment for all English men and women is the aim of the Trust. A gift by all, for all, a bit of nature in her unspoiled loveliness, are not there many more who will help towards this end?

OUR CHURCHES AND SOCIAL PROBLEMS.

SIR,—Can you allow me space to reply to the personally kind letters of Mr. Millin and Mr. Richard Robinson?

In answer to Mr. Millin I would say that the church will have done its share in bringing about the better state of things which he and all of us desire if it sets before its members true principles of life, individual and social, and, above all, if it inspires an enthusiastic faith in those principles. "The soul of all improvement is the improvement of the soul." Help men to a living faith in God and all that that faith involves, convince them that the whole of life lies open to the great Taskmaster's eye, and the rest will follow. That, as I understand, was the method of Jesus, which fitted him to become the religious leader of peoples living in times and conditions very different from his own. In that method I, for one, have still a profound faith. The function of the church may, in a certain sense, be likened to that of the school. The school aims at developing faculty and kindling a zeal for knowledge, but does not concern itself with detailed applications. And so, I believe, the church in it sphere does well to work within corresponding limitations.

In reply to Mr. Robinson, may I beg him to consider obvious facts? I belong to a church, and I find among its members a prevailing and helpful sympathy on matters for the promotion of which the church primarily exists, but wide differences on social and political questions. I belong also to a social or political club, and there I find general agreement on the questions it seeks to promote, but the widest variety of religious belief. This being so, the sensible course would seem to be to follow what may be called the "natural" principle of association, uniting men together on the matters which they can pursue in common, and leaving them to go their several ways in respect of those things as to which they differ. I entirely sympathise with Mr. Robinson as to the undesirability of needlessly multiplying societies, and I think we Unitarians are not free from reproach in that matter. But we shall hardly rectify the blunder of having two or more societies for one purpose by trying to make one society answer two or more different purposes. One of our congregations, for example, numbers among its members two Members of Parliament who happen to sit on opposite sides of the Speaker's chair. Where would be the gain, religious or political, in introducing into that congregation the dividing element?

Mr. Robinson takes exception to the word "enclosures." Well, there are enclosures of all kinds. They may be open to the air and light of heaven, be surrounded by low fences and have gates that swing easily without and within. But I am not particular about the word. Let us say that for religious purposes men fall inevitably, through spiritual affinities, into groups (with or without protection). A man desiring religious fellowship selects the group most in harmony with his convictions and temperament. To-day perhaps less than ever does it follow that this religious sympathy carries with it of necessity agreement on social and political matters.

I had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Robinson for the first time nearly thirty years ago in Liverpool. He therefore knows as well as I how the principle for which I contend practically worked out in that great city. Many of the foremost citizens who were universally honoured for their private character and public services had drawn the inspiration of their lives from our churches, which, as churches, had confined themselves to their religious function. Many other illustrations might be given. I remember hearing that Cobden said that when he wished to start a new movement for the public good his first step always was to gather about him the young men of Cross-street Chapel, Manchester. The Church supplied the religious impulse which afterwards worked itself out in the world. I am proud to belong to a religious community which, on the one hand has not been scared by the cry of "sectarianism" from the duty of adhering to conviction, and, on the other, has rendered so much unsectarian service as the direct result of its religious faith.

I need hardly say that I entirely agree with your correspondents as to the importance of the questions in which they are so deeply interested. The difference between us is as to the best way of dealing with them. I notice that many who take their view cast side glances towards the working men, as though theirs was the method by which working men are to be brought within the fold of the Church. I seriously doubt it. There is a good deal of human nature about working men, and what is best and truest for others will prove, in the long run, best and truest for them also.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

PRIESTLEY CENTENARY BAZAAR IN BIRMINGHAM.

A LITTLE more than a year ago a correspondent in the Midlands informed your readers that the preliminary steps had been taken towards a united effort by our churches in the Midland district to raise not less than £5,000 to celebrate the 100th anniversary of the death of Joseph Priestley, which fell on February 6 last, the money to be spent in furthering the objects of the Midland Christian Union. Your correspondent prophesied that the money would be raised.

We are now within a month of the opening of the doors of the Birmingham Town Hall on the first day of the bazaar, and how do we stand?

An executive committee, composed of representatives from most of the churches in the Union, and four sub-committees have been hard at work for some time past; the seven principal stalls have been taken charge of by ladies from the various congregations, and the officers are now overwhelmingly busy attending to innumerable details in readiness for the opening day.

In addition to the usual stalls there will be a fruit and flower stall in the centre of the hall and a stall for the sale of a handbook of the Midland churches, which has been specially compiled for the occasion. It will contain a short account of every church, an illustration of the building, and a portrait of the minister, besides a short life of Priestley, with a portrait. The illustrations are from photographs taken during the summer, and the cover of the book bears a reproduction in colours of the Wedgwood medallion of Priestley.

A special sub-committee is also arranging for an exhibition of pictures, engravings, photographs, &c., partly to be lent and partly for sale and including a loan collection of portraits, medals, autograph letters, &c., relating to Priestley.

The stalls will be prettily decorated, and there will be the usual attractions in the way of music and entertainments, and ample accommodation for all who may require refreshment.

A short opening ceremony is being arranged for every day, and it is interesting to note that the bazaar on the first day will be declared open by Lady Trevelyan, the Lord Mayor of Birmingham presiding. On the second day the Right Hon. William Kenrick will preside, and on the third day Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., M.P. On the last day Mrs. Nettlefold will open the bazaar, Professor Carpenter presiding.

I repeat the prophecy of a year ago, and I say that the £5,000 will be raised. But the bazaar alone will not do it. I now give your readers the solid fact which makes me bold to foretell the future.

The President of the Union, Mr. Byng Kenrick, and the bazaar treasurer, Mr. P. J. Worsley, Jun., with some little assistance from others, have already obtained promises of donations amounting to £3,013, upon which they are to be heartily congratulated. It is true that a large part of this sum has been promised conditionally upon the whole being raised, but this makes it all the more necessary that the bazaar itself should be a complete success. We hope the £3,000 will be added to before the 30th inst.; but, if it is not, we shall have to realise a further sum of £2,000 and the expenses of the bazaar—say, £500 more.

There are now six vacant plupits out of twenty-three in the Union, and some of these churches without ministers, with others receiving grants from the funds, are already looking forward to the day of better things, which will not be far distant, should our hopes be realised. The churches without ministers are Banbury, Waverley-road, Birmingham; Evesham, Kidderminster, Oldbury, and Walsall. This is a great misfortune, especially at the present time, when we want all the help and encouragement we can get. Mr. Davis will be greatly missed, not only in Evesham, but in the Midland district generally. The loss of Mr. Priestley Evans at Kidderminster after a ministry of fourteen years will be deeply felt. The late Mr. McKean spent forty-six years in the ministry at Oldbury: His congregation and the town itself will feel his loss for many a long day to come.

To turn again to the bazaar, we have been unfortunate in losing the services of Mr. E. Ellis Townley, one of the hon. secs. A few weeks ago he was obliged through bereavement and illness at home to resign his office, and the whole of the secretarial work has devolved upon Mr. Dutfield, the other hon. sec., who is succeeding in doing the work of two people, and is sparing no pains to make the bazaar a success.

Birmingham has naturally been chosen from its central position as the place for the bazaar to be held in; but, for the benefit of those who live away from the town, I may say that the railway companies will bring them to Birmingham at reduced fares, of which full particulars will be duly announced.

There is surely no need for me to urge upon your readers, particularly those in the Midland district, the necessity of doing all they can in the three weeks that are left to get together contributions for the stalls, and send them as soon as possible to one of the ladies whose names and addresses will be found in your advertising columns. Yorkshire raised, I believe, £2,000 this time last year by their bazaar in the Leeds Town Hall, and we ought to be able to do the same in Birmingham. The East Cheshire Union have set themselves the same task as we have, and it will be interesting to see which of the two Unions will do the best.

Steady persistent work, with much importunity of others, and no less denial of themselves—this is what I hope to see practised during the next four weeks by all our friends who really have the best interests of our struggling congregations at heart, and who devoutly believe in the power of our simple faith to elevate and ennoble our fellow creatures.

Chairman of the Executive Committee

NOUGHT shall affright us on thy goodness leaning,
Low in the heart faith singeth still her song;
Chastened by pain, we learn life's deeper meaning,
And in our weakness thou dost make us strong.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Accrington.—Services to celebrate the 45th anniversary of the starting of Unitarian worship in this town were held on Sunday last, when the Rev. H. Kelsey White, of Urmston, preached earnest and inspiring sermons. The choir rendered special anthems. Mr. White's subject in the evening was "The Passing and the Permanent in Religion."

Bedfield.—The chapel anniversary was held on Sunday, October 23, when the afternoon preacher was the Rev. Frederic Allen. During the service a marble tablet, placed by the members of the chapel in memory of the late Mrs. Jenkin Davies, was unveiled by Miss Tagart. In the evening Mr. Newell presided, and on Monday evening a successful meeting was held, when Mr. Frank Youngman, of Thorpe Hall, presided, and was supported by Miss Tagart, Miss Hill, Rev. Frederic Allen, Mr. Newell, and others. The chapel was well filled upon all three occasions.

Bolton: Bank Street.—The choir sermons were preached on Sunday last by the minister; in the evening Barnby's "Rebekah" was given. The collection realised £20. The second of Mr. Weatherall's Religious Instruction Lectures was given in the Spinners' Hall on Tuesday, the subject being the Ascent of Man. The hall was filled to its utmost capacity (about 400), and a number of people were unable to gain admission. Next week's lecture will be on Anti-materialism.

Bradford.—At the Chapel Lane Chapel, on Saturday last, the opening meeting of the session of the Young People's Guild was held. The president (the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones) delivered an address on "Life: What will you make of it?" and at the conclusion, on behalf of the Guild and the church, offered a cordial welcome to the Rev. John Ellis, the recently appointed district minister of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union, and to Mrs. Ellis, on their return to Yorkshire. He referred to the former connection of Mr. and Mrs. Ellis with the congregation, and Mr. Ellis, in replying, said his first address was delivered from the Chapel Lane pulpit at the age of sixteen.

Chatham.—On Oct. 26 a sale of work was opened by Alderman Lamb, ex-Mayor and present Deputy-Mayor, at Hamond Hill Church. Generous help was given by a number of friends from a distance, as well as willing workers in the congregation, and more than two-thirds of the sum needed was obtained. An interesting feature of the evening's meeting was the presentation by Mrs. Ellis of a beautifully illuminated address, together with a purse of gold, to Mr. Cornford, the late conductor. Members of the choir and friends rendered suitable music at intervals.

Framlingham.—The 244th anniversary of the Old Meeting was held on Sunday, October 23, Rev. Frederick Allen being the preacher. On Tuesday evening the annual meeting was held, when, after tea, the chair was taken by Miss Tagart, supported as at the Bedfield meeting on the previous evening.

Lancaster.—The Sunday evening lectures by the Rev. J. Channing Pollard, in St. Nicholas-street Chapel, on "Some Affirmations of Unitarian Christianity," are (says the Lancaster Observer) creating widespread interest, as is evidenced by the increasingly large congregations. The subject on Sunday week was "The Bible we accept," and the chapel was well filled with an audience largely made up of men. Before the sermon Mr. Pollard stated that he had received through the post during the last two or three weeks a great many pamphlets and newspapers bearing upon the subject of his lectures, and showing that great interest was being taken; but as most of these were sent anonymously he could only take that opportunity of returning thanks for them.

Leeds: Hunslet.—On October 27, under the auspices of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the Rev. Dendy Agate, a former minister of this church, lectured on Orthodoxy, fifty years ago and to-day. There was a fair attendance, and Mr. Agate's lecture and visit were much enjoyed,

London: Essex Church.—On Tuesday, at 8.30, the Rev. Frank K. Freeston will begin, in the schoolroom, a course of five lantern lectures on "Our Religious Principles and our Free Churches." They will deal respectively with (1) "Our Nonconformity: Why it had to be"; (2) "The Ejected Clergy: What we owe to their Loyalty"; (3) Our Free Churches: How they first arose"; (4) "Our Free Faith: What it means"; (5) "Our Churches in London."

London: Mansford-street, E.—The thirty-seventh annual meeting of past and present scholars, teachers and workers of Spicer-street and Mansford-street, was held on Wednesday evening. The Rev. Gordon Cooper gave a hearty welcome to the visitors, and, regretting the absence of several old friends of the Mission, read letters from Rev. Dr. Drummond, Mr. S. W. Preston, Mr. E. B. Squire, and the Rev. John Ellis. He also expressed pleasure at the presence of the Rev. W. G. and Mrs. Cadman, whom they were all very glad to see. Mr. A. J. Clarke replied on behalf of the old friends from Spicer-street, and the Rev. W. G. Cadman spoke of the pleasure it gave him and Mrs. Cadman to be present. He also took advantage of the opportunity of expressing kindly wishes for the success and happiness of Mr. Cooper in his work at Mansford-street. Mr. J. C. Drummond also spoke in welcome of the new minister. There was a very large attendance of old and present scholars, teachers and workers, and a most enjoyable evening was spent.

London: Stratford.—Exceedingly successful performances of the cantata, "Princess Lara," were given by the junior members of the Temperance Guild and Band of Hope, on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday, October 26, 27, and 28, before an aggregate of some 600 persons. The greatest credit is due to the young performers who have worked so assiduously during the last five months, and to the conductor, Mr. W. T. Waddington. Through his influence an orchestra of thirteen instruments kindly lent its services, and added greatly to the success.

Malton.—On Monday, October 24, a public tea was held, after which the Rev. John Ellis lectured on "Joseph Priestley: a Pioneer of Rational Theology," illustrated with lantern slides.

Manchester: Bradford.—The new hall now added to the buildings erected four years ago is to be opened on Saturday afternoon, November 12, by Councillor Dr. Dreyfus, J.P. In the evening a public meeting will be held, to celebrate the occasion. A course of four lectures on "Citizenship" is announced for Tuesday evenings; the first, on Nov. 8, to be given by Mr. J. L. Paton, head master of Manchester Grammar School; the second, on Nov. 22, by Mr. J. W. Graham, Principal of Dalton Hall.

Nelson.—The new movement here continues to do well; attendances of 90, 95, and 60 have assembled the last three Sunday evenings. The pulpit was occupied on the 16th ult. by the Rev. W. H. Burgess, whilst the Rev. Thomas Leyland preached on the two following Sundays. Last Sunday afternoon a Sunday-school was begun, thirty scholars and workers being present. Altogether the outlook is distinctly encouraging.

North Lancashire and Westmorland Unitarian Association.—The annual meeting was held in Percy-street Chapel, Preston, on October 29. The afternoon service was conducted by Rev. A. A. Charlesworth (late of Birmingham), in the unavoidable absence of the Rev. Robt. McGee; and the Rev. C. Travers, the newly appointed minister of Preston, preached the sermon. Over a hundred sat down to tea in the schoolroom, and afterwards a meeting was held, the Rev. H. V. Mills in the chair. The secretary's report showed much work achieved during the year, and the treasurer reported a balance in hand. The Rev. J. Channing Pollard, of Lancaster, was elected President for 1904-5. The Revs. C. Travers and A. A. Charlesworth made interesting speeches. The new President brought a most interesting meeting to a close.

Norwich.—In a course of Sunday evening sermons, at the Octagon Chapel, on "Eastern Thought," the Rev. Alfred Hall preached last Sunday on "Bushido, the Ethical Teaching of Japan," warmly commending, in the course of his exposition, Professor Inazo Nitobe's book on "The Soul of Japan." Bushido, he said in conclusion, could not as it stood become a world ethic, because it was too national and too martial, but it had the power of expansion. The teaching of Jesus had more elements of a world religion in it than any other, but Christianity in its present form could never be the universal religion. It would have to learn humility from its founder. It would have to accept the best of Shintoism, Brahmanism, Buddhism, and other faiths, as Bushido had done. Christianity must be once more a living spirit, capable of taking on the forms of truth, whatever their source. They had much to learn from the East. Wisdom still came from that direction; and the Christianity that alone would survive the shocks of time and the intercourse of nations was the Christianity of men who say, "We have not yet apprehended. We have still much to experience and much to learn; and we press on."

Pontypridd.—At the harvest thanksgiving services on October 23, the Rev. W. James preached in the morning in Welsh, and in the evening in English. The Rev. W. Whitaker was the afternoon preacher. The attendance at the evening service was such as strongly to emphasise the need of a church building, for which the congregation are steadily working.

Poole.—A bazaar, on Wednesday, Oct. 26, opened by the Mayor, realised about £30, which, with a renovation fund amounting to £35, is a satisfactory result, in view of the two-fold need of renovation of the church and working expenses.

Pudsey.—The church anniversary was celebrated on Sunday, when, thanks to the aid of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the Rev. Principal Gordon, of Manchester, was the special preacher for the day. The morning service was conducted by the minister (Rev. Edgar Lockett). Mr. Gordon preached morning and evening, and at a special service in the afternoon the Rev. W. R. Shanks, of Holbeck, was the preacher. There were good congregations, especially in the evening.

Richmond (Farewell Presentation).—On Sunday, Oct. 30, the Rev. S. Farrington preached his farewell sermons at the Free Church, Ormond-road. The congregations at both morning and evening services included many past as well as present members of the church. At the termination of the evening service Mr. G. H. Edwards, on behalf of the congregation, presented Mr. and Mrs. Farrington with a cheque, subscribed by past and present members, at the same time expressing earnest and affectionate wishes for their welfare in the well-earned leisure upon which they were entering. Mr. Farrington, in accepting the gift, replied most warmly on behalf of Mrs. Farrington and himself, and the proceedings terminated.

Stalybridge (Appointment).—The Rev. W. G. Price, who for the past ten years has been minister at Hinckley, is to enter on his new charge at Stalybridge to-morrow (Sunday), November 6.

Wareham.—The quarterly meeting of the Executive of the Southern Unitarian Association, held at South-street Chapel, on Thursday afternoon, October 27, was followed by a successful tea and public meeting. The President (Mr. J. Cogan Conway) touched on the early history of the place, and showed that Unitarianism in Wareham owed its origin, not to any wish to multiply the number of Christian churches in the town, but to the practical ejection of those holding Unitarian views from the Lower Meeting in 1828, when the South-street Chapel came into being. Revs. J. Burton, C. C. Coe, and Mr. W. T. Bushrod gave interesting and helpful addresses, and Mr. F. G. Pinnock (the hon. sec. of the Association) was welcomed on his return from America.

NEW UNITARIAN CHURCH, BIRKENHEAD.

IN Birkenhead for many years the dwelling portion of the town has been receding gradually from the neighbourhood of the Unitarian Church, and the consequent decrease in numbers made a change inevitable. From the amount realised by the sale of the old site, the sum of £5,000 was allotted for a new building, and a contract was made at this figure; but, owing chiefly to errors of judgment on the part of professional advisers, the final cost amounted to £7,000, exclusive of the land and of furnishing expenses.

The Congregation has done, and is doing, all that is possible in subscribing and raising money. In addition to subscriptions for the Church Building Fund, between £2,000 and £3,000 have been raised since 1897 for building Schools.

At the beginning of this year the total debt amounted to about £1,800, but this has now been reduced to about £1,100 by the subscriptions recorded below. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association warmly commend the endeavour to clear off the debt, and promise £100 as an expression of their interest, which they trust will be helpful. The Congregation appeal therefore for help to their fellow-worshippers in the Unitarian Body, so that unhampered by debt they may take advantage of the opportunity for increased activity, and spread in Birkenhead that faith which all Unitarians have at heart. Contributions will be gratefully acknowledged by

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE attention of residents in and about London is called to the advertisement in another column of the Autumn Meeting of the London District Unitarian Society, to be held at Essex Hall on Wednesday evening. All friends who can attend are cordially invited to the reception by the President and Mrs. Chatfeild Clarke, at seven o'clock, and to the subsequent meeting, at which addresses are to be given by Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, Bart., M.P., Rev. Burt Estes Howard, M.A., Ph.D., formerly a leading Presbyterian minister at Los Angelos, California, and Professor at Leland Stanford University; Mr. J. C. Macky, of Auckland; and Dr. Herbert Smith. In view of the important church building scheme in which the Society is now engaged, a full attendance at this meeting is specially to be desired.

AN advertisement of the East Cheshire Christian Union Bazaar will be found in another column. Donations amounting to £925 have already been received from the district itself and £206 from other friends. The bazaar will represent an Italian Garden City, and a capital military band has been engaged. A list of the donations will be published next week. May they first be largely augmented.

LORD LANSDOWNE, in the regretted absence of the Prime Minister, spoke for the Government at the Lord Mayor's banquet on Wednesday evening. His declaration of Peace with regard to the North Sea disaster, and the Commission of Inquiry was of an entirely satisfactory character, and it was noteworthy that he quoted Mr. Secretary Hay's recent description of war as "the most futile and the most ferocious of human follies." In another happy passage of his speech Lord Lansdowne told of the American Ambassador's renewed suggestion of a Treaty of Arbitration between this country and the United States, and of President Roosevelt's invitation to the Powers to take part in a second International Peace Conference to carry further the good work done at The Hague in 1899. His cordial word of congratulation to President Roosevelt on his re-election will waken a warm response throughout this country.

THE National Union of Women Workers of Great Britain has been holding its annual meetings at York this week, under the presidency of Miss Clifford, of Bristol, who was re-elected to that office. The question of housing reform was discussed on Tuesday. Mrs. George Cadbury, who was in the chair, said they could not expect spiritual life and morale to be strong in those who lived in badly ventilated, insanitary, and overcrowded areas. England had much to learn from Germany and other European countries in this respect. The causes of overcrowding were the lack of public control, the scarcity of land for building due to the system of land tenure, and the natural selfishness of urban landlords. They needed taxation of land values, abolition of entail, and power given to authorities to purchase large tracts of land in order to make progress with housing reform. Mrs. Morrison, of Liverpool, said that if Christianity did not remove slum dwellings, slum dwellings would remove Christianity.

CORRESPONDENCE and leader in the Times remind us that the unemployed problem is not the only one that will have to be faced this winter. The parties to this controversy of lodging-houses and shelters are Mr. C. S. Loch, of the Charity Organisation Society, Mr. Bramwell Booth, of the Salvation Army, the Editor, and Sir Richard Farrant. But the latter only intervenes to point out the absurdity of Mr. Loch's suggestion that Salvation Army shelters and Rowton Houses, the poor man's hotel, are comparable. Mr. Loch, supported by the editorial writer, arraigns the shelters. They do not tend to lessen distress; on the contrary the provision of shelters created even larger numbers of vagrants to inhabit them. It may be so. But Mr. Loch's figures do not support the argument. The fact that large numbers of men who are found in the workhouse have previously been in a shelter is obviously no proof that, had there been no shelter, they would not have been found in the workhouse. A more serious objection is alleged, viz., the bad effect of the competition of charity prices with the actual cost price of accommodation.

BOTH Mr. Loch and Mr. Booth seem to have written in a hurry, and neither, perhaps, has done full justice to his case. But, apart from the controversy, which does not help us, we have to recognise the facts. Here actually is a population in a condition for the most part of industrial inefficiency. Somehow they have to live. In some fashion the shelters help them to live. The shelters are bad, undoubtedly. They focus filth and destitution; their physical atmosphere is deleterious. They are overcrowded. Grant them bad. But the society is first bad which allows them and which can hardly prevent them while it allows the destitution which fills them. There is abundant room for criticism of the London shelters. The more important thing is to find a substitute. We need to give, as a nation, something better than these shelters to the men who are already sunk thus low. We need, secondly, to check the supply of outcasts. But here we are led again to the question of employment. So impossible is it entirely to separate one evil from the other, since they are both disease of the one social body.

MR. JOHN BURNS, M.P., in the Lees and Raper Lecture which he gave recently at the Manchester Free Trade Hall on "Labour and Drink," had no difficulty in showing how enormous are the evils of drink among the working classes of this country. While repudiating the suggestions frequently made, and recently reiterated by the Rev. R. J. Campbell, that the vice is particularly prevalent among the class for whom he speaks, he holds that it prevents them from obtaining their rightful influence in politics and social reform. Other classes of the community are quite as much addicted to drink; but it is intemperance among the workers, with consequent enfeeblement of character and waste of resources, that chiefly withholds them from success in attainment of their rightful demands, and keeps their organisations weaker than they ought to be. Such was the gist of one of the most telling parts of his lecture, and it is no doubt true that a sober democracy would be a triumphant democracy. It is a good omen when labour leaders like Mr. Burns and Mr. Will Crooks, who are strenuous in the cause of the working classes, speak straightly and without flattery to them on the evils of intemperance and gambling as they have recently done. It is to be desired that those who are influential among the wealthier members of the community should be equally direct and insistent as to these insidious evils which degrade all classes.

PRAISE came, not long ago, to a Unitarian writer from an unexpected quarter. Referring to the recent Daily Telegraph correspondence on religious belief and disbelief, the Church Times mentioned "Nunquam's" attack on Christianity, and Dr. Warschauer's reply in "Anti-Nunquam." On the one hand, said the Church Times, is the attack :—

And here, on the other hand, is an analysis of it which, if merciless, is conspicuously fair. Under it the agnostic thesis simply collapses. If any of our readers wishes to read a quite masterly and scathing exposure of Mr. Blatchford's fallacies, we strongly advise him to expend sixpence upon the purchase of "Anti-Nunquam." Almost on every page Mr. Blatchford is convicted of ignorance, of mis-statement, of self-contradiction. His dates are wrong by whole centuries. He blunders repeatedly over simple matters of fact. The points of his indictment, paraded with such solemnity, prove to be the same aged sophistries which have been refuted over and over again. In a word, if any impartial reader were asked to decide between the attack and the defence, as presented in these two volumes, his verdict could not be doubtful for a moment.

THE Clarion newspaper and the organisations it has started would appear to many to be doing far more Christian work than might be supposed by one who knew nothing of them beyond the ill-informed articles of "Nunquam" on religious subjects. Their "Cinderella" parties for poor children are among the most successful of these enterprises. A recent development is the Clarion Guild of Handicraft, which was started on a suggestion in the "Woman's Letter" of the Clarion about four years ago. A fair number of local guilds are in existence, which, animated, like William Morris, with the desire that beauty should be a part of our daily lives, and that work should be interesting, useful, and beautiful, try to get back to some extent to the old simple methods of work without slavery to machines. The exhibition recently opened in Manchester shows that in the large, populous, and often dreary towns of the North, there is a considerable number of people capable of becoming handicraftsmen, skilled, inventive, with such joy in the work as Ruskin wished for all: and though but few may, under present conditions, succeed in maintaining themselves and their families by such work, it is at least an enrichment of life and character to have such occupations as a hobby, or supplementary source of income ; and these Guilds of Handicraft may help us to a more sober use of machinery. The exhibition was opened by Mr. Walter Crane; and on a later day by the Countess of Warwick. Mr. Robert Blatchford was prevented by illness from taking a similar part.

The October Quarterly Review contains an article by Professor W. Lewis Jones on "Thomas Traherne and the Religious Poetry of the Seventeenth Century." Our readers may remember two interesting articles on Traherne by the Rev. W. C. Hall in THE INQUIRER of March 19 and 26. The recent discovery of this old writer Professor Jones welcomes as a real addition to the treasures of English poetry, though inclined to think him greater as prose writer than as poet.

We are not, indeed, prepared to rate him at his discoverer's sanguine valuation. Mr. Dobell is positive that "neither Herbert, Crashaw, nor Vaughan can compare with Traherne in the most essential qualities of the poet." Far from being the superior, he is not, in our opinion, the equal of any one of the three, tried by any test of poetical quality. He is, however, good enough to be admitted to their company ; and with Herbert and Vaughan in particular, he has sufficiently close affinities, both literary and racial, to warrant our treating the three together as a separate group among the poets of their time.

That all three were Welshmen Professor Jones notes as only a slight bond of union from a literary point of view. They were also good churchmen and loyalists, and their kinship as poets is clearly brought out in Professor Jones's study.

That Traherne reminds one of Vaughan, closely enough to have been at first taken by Dr. Grosart for the Silurist himself, Professor Jones shows by more than one quotation. The following lines, he says, inevitably recall the author of "The Retreat" :—

How like an angel came I down!
How bright are all things here!
When first among His works I did appear,
O! how their glories did me crown!
The world resembled His eternity,
In which my soul did walk ;
And everything that I did see
Did with me talk.

Another quotation we must take from Professor Jones's article, two verses of Traherne's poem on "Wonder," expressing the innocent and wondering delight of a child who feels himself to be "heir of the whole world" :—

The skies in their magnificence,
The lively, lovely air,
Oh how divine, how soft, how sweet, how fair!
The stars did entertain my sense,
And all the works of God, so bright and pure,
So rich and great did seem,
As if they ever must endure
In my esteem.

A native health and innocence
Within my bones did grow ;
And, while my God did all His glories show,
I felt a vigour in my sense
That was all Spirit. I within did flow
With seas of life, like wine ;
I nothing in the world did know
But 'twas divine.

The same happy spirit of an innocent childhood, the childhood of a man in the true life with God, finds expression in these lines :—

A joyful sense of purity
Is all I can remember ;
The very night to me was bright,
'Twas Summer in December.

THE CRISIS IN GEORGE ELIOT'S RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE.

THE editor of "George Eliot's Life," while admitting that "the early part of Maggie's portraiture is the best autobiographical representation we can have of George Eliot's own feelings in her childhood," wisely cautions us against "trusting to it as a true history." The caution, however, hardly applies to such an aside as this: "That is the path we all like when we set out on our abandonment of egoism—the path of martyrdom and endurance, where the palm branches grow, rather than the steep highway of tolerance, just allowance, and self-blame, where there are no leafy honours to be gathered and worn." Here, traced by her own pen, we have a map of the two ways which George Eliot travelled, and in her abandonment of one for the other may be detected the crisis in her religious life. It is rather here than in the change of her religious views. That remarkable "transition" from an extreme form of evangelical orthodoxy to assertive free thought did not greatly affect her character. The Mary Anne Evans who refused to go to church with her father was of the same temper as the ardent young Calvinist who "sacrificed the cultivation of her intellect, and a proper regard to personal appearance"; who would have denied her brother what she came afterwards to see were "quite lawful amusements," and who greatly disgusted him by going about "like an owl." In both these cases we see the same eager desire for the path of martyrdom and endurance, unchastened by the "just allowance" and "self-blame," and delicate consideration for others which were to come later. Perhaps one of the earliest signs of the advent of these qualities was the change in her regard for a Wesleyan uncle. Mrs. Cash thus relates the incident :—

"It must have been in those early days that she spoke to me of a visit from one of her uncles in Derbyshire, a Wesleyan, and how much she had enjoyed talking with him, finding she could enter into his feelings so much better than she had done in past times, when her views seemed more in accordance with his own, but were really less so." ("George Eliot's Life," p. 54.)

It is a familiar experience. Those who can utter the same orthodox Shibboleth are often far apart in feeling. When "her views seemed more in accordance with his own"; when their creeds were similar, despite his Arminianism and her Calvinism, uncle and niece could not understand each other ; but now that she had turned to "the steep highway of tolerance, just allowance, and self-blame," her eyes were opened, and she could enter into his feelings. In a similar way through her wonderful sympathy she entered into the spirit of "The Imitation." Its influence on Maggie Tulliver is doubtless an autobiographical touch, and no change in her views obliterated the impression. It was so again with that very different personality Sir Walter Scott. Few are wont to regard Sir Walter as a great religious teacher. That death-bed utterance to Lockhart, "Be a good man, dear," has doubtless wrought more for righteousness than most sermons ; but in his art Scott deliberately ignores the deeper problems of religion. And yet his very reticence seems to have powerfully affected George Eliot. "To the inquiry of a friend in after years, as to the influence to which she attributed the first unsettlement of her orthodox views, she quickly made answer: "Oh, Walter Scott's." ("Life of George Eliot," p. 48.) Many years later, in 1871, she wrote: "I like to tell you that my worship for Scott is peculiar. I began to read him when I was seven years old"; and "it is a personal grief, a heart wound to me, when I hear a depreciatory or slighting word about Scott." (Ibid. p. 475.) The influence of Scott which was so permanent a force in her life contributed doubtless not only to her first change of view, but to what I have regarded as the real crisis of her religious experience, for he is surely a better guide in "the steep highway of tolerance, just allowance, and self-blame," than in "the path of martyrdom and endurance, where the palm branches grow."

In a letter to Miss Sara Hennell written in 1843 we have a clear expression of this change of sentiment, and as it is dated less than three years after the removal to Coventry, when the first great change took place, she cannot have remained very long in the crude and assertive stage of free thought which she so well describes.

The subject of your conversation with Miss D. is a very important one, and worth an essay. I will not now inflict one of mine on you, but I will tell you as briefly as possible my present opinion, which, you know, is contrary to the one I held in the first instance. I am inclined to think that such a change of sentiment is likely to happen to most persons whose views on religious matters undergo a change early in life. The first impulse of a young and ingenuous mind is to withhold the slightest sanction from all that contains even a mixture of supposed error. When the soul is just liberated from the wretched giant's bed of dogmas on which it has been racked and stretched ever since it began to think, there is a feeling of exultation and strong hope. We think we shall run well when we have the full use of our limbs, and the bracing air of independence, and we believe that we shall soon obtain something positive which will not only more than compensate us for what we have renounced, but will be so well worth offering to others, that we may venture to proselytise as fast as our zeal for truth may prompt us. But a year or two of reflection, and the experience of our own miserable weakness, which will ill afford to part even with the crutch of superstition, must, I think, effect a change. Speculative truth begins to appear but a shadow of individual minds. Agreement between intellects seems unattainable, and we turn to the truth of feeling as the only universal bond of union. (Ibid. p. 73.)

To have attained this position meant very much to George Eliot. Here her wonderfully sympathetic nature found rest and satisfaction which could not have been attained elsewhere, and safeguarded as she does safeguard the position in some subsequent sentences from any suspicion of indifference to truth, the rest and satisfaction were not ignoble. It was this which enabled her to enter into the feelings of her Wesleyan uncle "so much better than in past times," when her views not only "seemed," but were, simply as views, "so much more in accordance with his own." It was this which enabled her to paint with equal mastery a Mr. Lyon or a Mr. Tryon, Mr. Gilfil, and Amos Barton. A subsequent letter recalling her life at Geneva in 1849 shows that there were fluctuations in this state:—

When I was at Geneva, I had not yet lost the attitude of antagonism which belongs to the renunciation of any belief. . . . Ten years of experience have wrought great changes in that inward self. I have no longer any antagonism towards any faith, in which human sorrow, and human longing for purity, have expressed themselves; on the contrary, I have a sympathy with it that predominates over all argumentative tendencies. (Life, p. 298.)

This but asserts the completion of a process which had commenced much earlier, and for the remainder of her life there was no contraction of sympathy for sincere religious expression, a sympathy which appears to have been incomprehensible to some of her Free-thinking friends.

I can't tell you how much melancholy it causes me that people are, for the most part, so incapable of comprehending the state of mind which cares for that which is essentially human in all forms of belief, and desires to exhibit it under all forms with loving truthfulness. Free-thinkers are scarcely wider than the Orthodox in this matter. (Life, pp. 278-9.)

For such blended power of thought and sympathy it would be difficult to find an equal amongst her contemporaries. The furious dogmatism of Carlyle and Ruskin affords us a powerful contrast to it, and Emerson's benevolent aloofness is about as remote. Probably the mind of James Martineau was most akin to hers for this rare double quality; and though evidences of their mental contact are few and slight, the effect may have been greater than has been disclosed. We know that George Eliot read Martineau with delight, and went to hear him preach, though, on the only occasion recorded in her life, she went in vain:—

Apropos of the pulpit, I had another failure in my search for edification, last Sunday. Mme. Bodichon and I went to Little Portland-street Chapel, and lo! instead of James Martineau, there was a respectable old Unitarian gentleman preaching about the dangers of ignorance, and the satisfaction of a good conscience, in a tone of amiable propriety which seemed to belong to a period when brains were untroubled by difficulties, and the lacteals of all good Christians were in perfect order. I enjoyed the fine selection of collects he read from the Liturgy." (Life, p. 342.)

This was in 1861. Whether the experiment was repeated with better success in after years there appears no record in the "Life"; but on the "steep highway of tolerance" George Eliot and James Martineau were not far asunder.

TO LOVE.

LOVE! that wast born in heaven,
And nurtured by angel hands,
Purer far than the jewels
That flash from the starry strands,
Come to this world of waiting,
That droops in the holy quest,
In thee alone is comfort,
And God made manifest.

Speak thou the word to the nations
Of heaven and earth and hell,
From the pit of the fallen angels,
To the summits whence they fell.
Thou art the great redeemer,
The fount of eternal rest,
In thee is life immortal,
And God made manifest.

LITERATURE.

EARLY HEBREW STORY.*

THIS book consists of lectures given to the Bangor Theological Seminary, Maine, United States, in the November of 1903. The author, rightly perhaps, avoids learned references, and addresses himself to a popular audience. We could wish, however, that having chosen this method he had been more careful to avoid groundless and in some cases erroneous speculation. It is, for instance, absolutely impossible, with due respect for the most obvious rules of philology, to hold, as Dr. Peters does on p. 5, that "Yashar, in the longer form Yeshurun, is nothing more nor less than Israel (Yishra-el) [sic] with the final el omitted." Again, it is, to say the least, fanciful and precarious to regard (p. 35) Lot as a personification of the Raten mentioned on the Egyptian monuments as living east of the Jordan, the Egyptian R being, according to a well-known rule, transliterated into the Semitic l. Lot, according to the story in Genesis, did not belong to the aborigines on the east of the Jordan; and he is the ancestor of the Moabites and Ammonites who, so far from being Rutenites, were, on the contrary, the foes who conquered and practically annihilated the aboriginal inhabitants. Lot, if Lot were all one with Ruten, is the very last person they would have chosen for an ancestral hero. Dr. Peters should not have stated (p. 105), without even hinting at another derivation, that the Jews interpreted Beersheba as meaning seven wells, especially as he goes on to inform us that four or five wells exist there in actual operation; and that "there are evidences of the existence of still more, apparently seven in all." According to the rules of Hebrew grammar, the translation "seven wells" is almost certainly wrong; it is quite certainly wrong, unless we take refuge in some Canaanite or dialectical idiom otherwise unknown. "Well of Seven," possibly seven gods or spirits, is a grammatical translation, and one which yields a tolerable sense. "Well of the Oath" is also a tenable explanation. "Few persons, it is to be hoped," says Dr. G. A. Smith, "go to Beersheba, looking for seven wells." We are also very much puzzled by the date to which Dr. Peters assigns "Sargon of Accad," viz., 2,800 B.C. (p. 29). We were at first inclined to take this as a misprint for 3,800, but there are other passages in the lectures which look as if Dr. Peters really placed Sargon I. at so late a time. He has, of course, a right to his own opinion, but he should have given his reasons. The date commonly given has prima facie evidence in its favour from the well-known cylinder of Nabonidus. Most extraordinary of all is Dr. Peters' suggestion (p. 107) that the 107th Psalm was, "in its original form, a liturgical hymn sung at the great autumnal festival by worshippers" in "the ancient temple of Dan." What shadow of an argument is there to support this supposition? We know of none, nor does Dr. Peters enlighten us on the question. We should have thought the one thing certain is that the Psalm is post-exilic, and this is fully recognised by so moderate and conservative a scholar as Bäthgen who is by no means devoted to the fashionable theory that nearly all the Psalms are post-exilic. The exile is presupposed in express terms, and though it is quite conceivable that these references to the exile are later additions, even so the residuum reads like the thanksgiving of a private individual who acknowledges the hand of God in his deliverance from calamity.

These, however, are single points which do not seriously affect the lectures as a whole. For the book, generally speaking, we have nothing but most grateful and enthusiastic commendation. Dr. Peters contributes most interesting matter from the stores he has acquired by his experience as a practical archæologist. We would draw attention, for example, to the account (p. 139 seq.) of the material evidence recently discovered for the existence of child sacrifice in Canaan.

> At Ta'anach, in the neighbourhood of a rock-hewn altar, the Austrian explorer Sellin found jars containing the bones of children and only of children. . . . In the enclosure of the megalithic temple at Gezeb, Macalister found similar jars containing, as at Ta'anach, the bones only of children. These jar burials of the infants in connection with an altar or temple can be accounted for, in the belief of the explorers, only on the supposition that they were sacrificial victims."

Turning to wider questions we have a lecture on the history of the conquest, and the formation of Israel, which is as good as anything we have seen on the subject—better, we should say, by far than anything which has appeared in English. Here, again, Dr. Peter's familiarity with the physical features of Palestine adds in a marked degree to the effectiveness of his work. The main part of the book discusses the mythology and folklore of the Hebrews, and points out that they are to be found not only in early documents, but also in late prophets, like Ezekiel as well as in Job and in post-exilic Psalms. In these last, of course, they are used for purpose of illustration and as poetic imagery; they are not the objects of serious belief. Their connection with Babylon and their transmutation under the influence of a higher religion are fully and clearly explained. The book ends with an eloquent and weighty vindication of that eternal appeal which God speaking through the living oracles of the Old Testament makes to the consciences and hearts which He has made. Dr. Peters is absolutely without fear of fact; he is most willing to follow wherever reason leads. But he writes none the less with a Christian conviction which is transparently sincere. We may look with much comfort on the present position of Old Testament criticism. Its results are now accepted by all competent to judge. But the first shock of surprise has spent its force, and thoughtful men find more reason, not less reason, to reverence the Old Testament as the Word of God. This is not because it was written at a certain date or by certain persons, but because it has done the work of God, and prepared the way for God's final and perfect revelation of Himself in His Son.

DANTE'S WORKS.

Is it well that we should know the details of the actual life of the men whose works stand to us as the revelations of great ideals? Was it well that the curtain should be raised (if indeed it has been raised) to reveal the privacies of Carlyle's home? Is it well that we should have gone behind Bonaventura's official life of St. Francis and the popular legendary accounts of the Fioretti, and penetrated to the intimate conflicts and anxieties of the last years of the saint's life? Is it well that we should follow up the half-obliterated traces of those early years of Dante's manhood over which he himself drew a double veil in the Vita Nuova and in the Convivio? We shall answer differently according to our temperaments, and according to the nature of the picture revealed. In the case of Francis we shall say "It is well." In the case of Carlyle we may hesitate. But in Dante's case, whatever we may think or desire, we may be very sure that the process of investigation will not be arrested. Whatever can be learnt concerning the minutest detail that affects him will be learned, and will be published without reserve and without compunction, however it affects us. To the reader who knows Dante only by the Comedy and possibly the Vita Nuova the questions which chiefly occupy students of his life at the present moment will probably seem either irrelevant or jarring. But the student who has noted the more than superficial contradictions between the narrative of the Vita Nuova and the "Apologia" of the Convivio, will be visited at times with a positive thirst for some further and surer knowledge than he possesses, and the ruthless and irreverent devotee of fact as such (fact often as distinct from the higher truth) will want to know exactly what lies behind Dante's mournful reference to the life which he and Forese led together, "the present memory of which must still be grievous," and the exact nature (as if for the register of convictions in a law court) of the offences that Dante confessed in an agony of remorse by the stream of Lethe; and he will want to know to the last ounce the real nature of the attachments, vain or fleeting, touched upon in the Vita Nuova, reflected in some of the Canzoni, denied in the Convivio, and mourned in the Comedy.

But what has this to do with re-issue of the complete works of Dante in the Latin and Italian text, without a single word of note or comment? Everything. The innocent reader thinks that when he holds a book in his hands he has really got the authentic work of the author. The Agamemnon of Æschylus that he buys in a shop is the Agamemnon that Aeschylus wrote; and Dante's sonnets are the sonnets of Dante. The question of authenticity troubles him little, the question of "readings" not at all. "What is taxes, Thomas?" asks the happy flunky. "What are readings?" asks the equally happy general reader. Alas! we have our treasures in earthen vessels. Copyists are not infallible, they have commonplace minds, and they are often conceited. They like to correct spelling and grammar, and are proud of substituting something intelligible (to them) for the unintelligible or illegible passages they find in the documents they are copying; and they dearly love to substitute commonplaces, which seem to them quite admirable, for bold and original utterances that strike them as strange and questionable. So the manuscripts gradually come to record things very different from what the author said. When printing was invented the works of great authors were generally printed from the manuscripts that lay nearest to hand, irrespective of their merit; and since almost all men are lazy, and most men who do anything are busy, it comes about that when once a book has been printed it is much more likely to be reprinted from the printed text than to be modelled on old and authentic manuscripts that stand nearer to what the author really said. With reference to the great classics, however, the necessary toil has for the most part been accomplished, and when, in 1894, the first edition of Dante's complete works in a single volume was issued, under Dr. Moore's editorship, by the Clarendon Press, the "text" of the Comedy, the Vita Nuova and the De Monarchia was pretty well fixed, and the reader might be assured that he really held in his hand something at any rate exceedingly near to what Dante himself wrote. With respect, however, to all the other works (that is to say, about half of Dante's total literary output) it was far otherwise. But the ten years that have since elapsed have been fruitful in minute investigations; and by an easily intelligible sympathetic process the attention of editors has become more sensitive, and standards have been raised, even as to matters concerning which the material for judgment was accessible long ago. And consequently the investigator of the details of Dante's life who is determined to base himself primarily upon the works of Dante himself is in a very different position now that he holds in his hand the Oxford Dante of 1904 from that in which he was placed by the edition of 1894. For example, in a letter addressed by Dante, very near the end of his life, to his friend and patron, Can Grande della Scala, the reader found in the edition of 1894, "but now, fresh in your favour, for which I thirst, making little of my own life, I will press forward to the goal," &c. Here was a perplexity. Dante seems to declare, in a passage in the Paradiso, that he met Can Grande soon after his banishment, and yet, nearly twenty years later he speaks of being "fresh in his favour," though, according to the general tradition, he had spent a considerable part of the interval at his court. But the reader of the 1904 edition finds "but now zeal for your glory, for which I thirst (taking small account of my own), will press me forward to the goal," &c. If this is what Dante really wrote, the difficulty disappears. Again, the curious reader of Dante who has gone outside the main lines and has studied the minor poems has long loved the charming sonnet addressed by Dante to his friend Guido, wishing that they two, and one Lapo, the third in a triad of friendship, were wafted about in a magic boat that ever bore them where they willed, discoursing still of love, with their three ladies placed by the same good enchanter with them, each one as well content as they, the three friends, would be. Here, beside Vanna and another lady, referred to, but unnamed, the reader of the 1894 edition finds "Bice." For once, it seemed, Dante had dropped the solemn "Beatrice," and adopted the familiar name by which (as Boccaccio assures us) his lady was always known in her home and amongst her friends. The tone of the poem contrasts with that of the Vita Nuova. There is a touch of human intimacy in this sonnet that led one to suppose that in the Vita Nuova Dante had deliberately selected those poems only which preserved the attitude of distant awe, and had excluded the more closely human traits of his love. But the reader of the 1904 edition will find that "Bice" has disappeared, and her place is taken by Lagia (Lapo's love, as Vanna was Guido's), while the lady whom Dante couples by inference with himself is the one less directly indicated, quite certainly not Beatrice, and in all probability that first "screen lady" to whom Dante says he dedicated certain trifles in rhyme with the express purpose of misleading the busy-bodies who concerned themselves with the secrets of his heart. The austerity of his relation to Beatrice remains unqualified. Here, too, the reader will meet in one of the sonnets a certain "Lisetta" (where the previous edition had simply "una donna"), and he will probably identify her with the Lady of the Window of the Vita Nuova. And here he ought to find, but will not (for the new edition, though an advance upon the old one, is not perfect) a "Violetta" in a somewhat mysterious ballad, as to the meaning of which he may speculate at discretion. And, finally, he will discover for the first time a series of sonnets which I was going to say will throw light upon Dante's references to the period of debasement which he deplores in his conversation with Forese, and weeps over when he confronts Beatrice. But, as a matter of fact, to the unassisted reader they will shed nothing but darkness upon anything, for they are written in a cipher of almost hopeless obscurity. If deciphered they will be found to be unworthy poems, and it seems a pity that the ink in which they are written could not have been washed out by Dante's tears, as the memory of them was from his own heart by the waves of Lethe. But they are nothing so very discreditable, after all. No real taint attaches to the author of them, and if the lowest utterances of the least exalted period of a great man's life had nothing worse to reveal than what is reflected in these poems, his admirers might well feel that their faith in their hero has been justified rather than put to shame by the revelations that less reverent hands had made.

Enough has been said to show that the significance of a new edition of Dante's collected works is not merely technical; and probably readers of THE INQUIRER will take little interest in the discussion of minute details. We must be content, therefore, with the general statement that, whereas the new edition is a boon for which all students of Dante will be grateful, it nevertheless leaves ample room for future improvements, the last of the canzoni, for instance, still being far from satisfactory.

In short we may say with Carlyle that, if (as is reasonable) we reckon from zero upwards, rather than from infinity downwards, we may thank Dr. Moore with some fulness of heart for the very much that he has given us.

THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.*

VOL. VIII.—the fourth to be issued—of the Cambridge Modern History deals with the French Revolution. In noticing former volumes we have referred to the general plan of the work, and to some features which strike us as defects. We need not accordingly refer to these matters again. We have in the volume before us the same subdivision of labour, which goes far to destroy its unity, and to reduce it to a collection of elaborate monographs. Five chapters dealing with the earlier history of the Revolution have been assigned to Professor F. C. Montague. Professor Lodge writes on the European Powers and the Eastern Question and the extinction of Poland, while the chapters dealing with the rise and early activity of Bonaparte have been assigned naturally to Mr. J. Holland Rose. Professor Montague brings out two points very clearly which are of more than passing application. The first is the connection between the revolutionary outbreak in France and the desperate state of the national exchequer. Perhaps nothing can illustrate this more forcibly than the proposal of 1786 to raise 30 million livres for prospective improvements in Paris with the avowed object of lending the money indefinitely to the Government. The extraordinary series of plunges which were taken to stave off impending ruin is among the most impressive warnings of history of the nemesis which overtakes unsound finance and unchecked extravagance in the spending departments. The other point is the failure of the moderate beginnings of the revolutionary movement owing to the want of training in the methods and habits of democratic government. As Professor Montague puts it:—

"The French of 1789 had no experience of parliamentary institutions, and could not therefore possess the habits and instincts of parliamentary life. The desire for self-government, then so general among the upper classes of France, had been fed by literature and philosophy, not by practice. In the first stage of the French Revolution even the keenest and most judicial minds could little forecast the future; while the general public had no prevision whatever, but lived blindly from day to day.

And this incapacity followed them with fatal results into the conduct of affairs. "More than once to-day," Arthur Young wrote in his Journal on June 15, 1789, "there were a hundred members on their legs at a time, and Monsieur Bailly absolutely without power to keep order." It is a singular illustration of the advantage of long training in what Bagehot has called "government by discussion," and goes far to explain the immunity of England in recent times from revolutionary movements. At the present moment in view of the policy pursued by M. Combes it is of interest to follow the attempt made by the Revolutionary government to readjust the relations of Church and State. Nothing was further from its mind than the later ideal of Cavour of a free church in a free state. The influence of the crown was simply to pass to the nation, and the clergy were to submit to an elaborate regulation by the civil power. "Particular societies," said Mirabeau, "placed in the general society break the unity of its principles, and the equilibrium of its forces." This was, undoubtedly, the traditional feeling due to the influence of Roman jurisprudence upon mediæval French law. It is, in fact, a continuance of the policy of the Empire towards the collegia. To the Roman jurist there would be no alternative between "non licet vos esse," and the incorporation of Christianity in the State. The same idea was still vital at the time of the French Revolution. The point of view is one which it is not very easy for the English mind to understand owing to the very different lines of our historical development.

In conclusion we may call attention to two essays of a more general character. Mr. P. F. Willert writes the opening chapter on philosophy and the Revolution, in which he argues that the influence of theory has been unduly magnified; and Mr. G. P. Gooch contributes a closing survey of the Revolution as "the most important event in the life of modern Europe." The latter is necessarily sketchy, for it ranges over Burke and Wordsworth, the German Aufklärung, the writings of de Maistre, and political movements from Russia to Portugal, but within the severe limits of space it is well done, and makes a fitting epilogue to the volume.

THE MAN CALLED JESUS.*

MR. KINGSLAND writes for those who feel unable to accept the dogma of Jesus Christ's deity. His object is to convince them, by a study of the humanity of Jesus, that no answer save that of his deity can account for so transcendently beautiful and perfect a human character. Unitarians will welcome the book as one more sign that the spiritual life of humanity is being more and more recognised as the true channel along which the living waters of divine revelation flow. Time was when the working of miracles was regarded by the Christian believer, no less than by the unbelieving Pharisee, as the crucial test of the deity of Christ. But times have changed, and though Mr. Kingsland freely accepts the miraculous in the life of Jesus, he yet bases his argument upon the spiritual perfection of Jesus' character.

We will endeavour briefly to summarise the picture of Jesus presented to us as an absolutely perfect spiritual man.

First, then, we behold him, when only twelve years of age, attaining a consciousness of personal and perfect spiritual affinity with God, unparalleled before in human experience. The eighteen years of silence and self-repression that follow reveal the intensity of his devotion to the call which then came to him to prepare himself by perfect obedience for the great work of self-denial which God had entrusted to him. These long years of spiritual experience and preparation culminate in that full development of his spiritual vision which constitutes the "change of mind" that occurred to him on the occasion of his baptism. Mr. Kingsland believes that at this period Jesus became aware of his possession of miraculous powers, in consequence of which he was instantly beset by temptation and long uncertainty how and for what purposes he might make use of these powers. His perfect character is revealed once more in the self-denying and spiritual outcome of these temptations. An interesting chapter reviews Jesus' visit to Nazareth, and the first rebuff there received. John vi. is next emphasised as revealing the occasion (the desire of the multitude to make him king) upon which Jesus, in a sudden crisis, swiftly and unreservedly changed his whole method and plan. Seeing the disastrous consequences of his popularity, and the unspiritual conception of his mission that prevailed in the mind of the multitude, he deliberately destroys his own popularity, and, by a supreme act of self-denial, rids himself of the multitudes that had followed him only through a misunderstanding of his message.

With a few friends Jesus now turns to face death, ignominy, and scorn, and in due course, well knowing the result, steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem. Not without natural human agony, perplexity, and sorrow did he finally pursue to the bitter end the path that led him to the cross. By faith rather than by sight he accepted at his heavenly Father's hands the dark and mysterious duty of going to Jerusalem to die. He did not foresee in his agony the glorious issue. As a man, and yet as a man gifted every instant with miraculous powers, by which he might have overthrown all the powers that tortured him, he voluntarily, and by faith, endured each moment of the cross. After the man had suffered thus, there was revealed to others through his resurrection the gloriousness of the work that he had accomplished, and the Divine significance and purpose of his death. Only by such absolute obedience and self-sacrifice could the message of Jesus be revealed—God's love for sinners and the limitless sacrifice which love must make to win their confidence.

Reviewing this life of Jesus and its spirit of perfect human obedience to the dark and mysterious commands of God; reviewing also the facts of Jesus' resurrection and of the redemption actually wrought through his being willing to die; we are asked if any other explanation of the man called Jesus can adequately explain the facts except that of acknowledging that this man was indeed the Son of God.

Our reply must be brief. In the first place, as regards the miraculous powers attributed to Jesus, they present us with a picture of his humanity so different from our own conception of it that it seems futile to enter into any argument in detail concerning them. In the second place, as regards the spiritual perfection of Jesus, we naturally ask, would his perfection (supposing it were proved) demonstrate his deity? We think not. In God's world we naturally look for perfection. The flower, the bird, the sunshine, and the rain, so far as they appear to us to be, for their several purposes, perfect, are yet not usually spoken of as "deities." Why, then, should a man, similarly perfected, be interpreted as a deity? When Jesus points to God's work in the lilies of the field, he clearly acknowledges God's presence in nature, yet does not ask us to worship either the grass, or the flowers, or the birds. Similarly the work of God may be seen in the life of Jesus himself, and the glory of Jesus may exceed that of Solomon just as the lilies did, yet we do not call Jesus or the lilies separate deities. The fact of Jesus' perfections being spiritual does not alter the argument. Fundamentally all things are spiritual. The glory of the lilies is spiritual. It is God's beautiful thought in them that we love to look upon.

Again, as it seems to us, the Syro-Phœnician woman returned on one occasion a perfect answer. Must we needs puzzle ourselves with the question, how could this woman have given so perfect an answer except she were the only-begotten daughter of God?

Similarly, if Jesus on this occasion or that gave a perfect answer, or if we multiply instances of his perfection, and show that his conduct was always perfect, as was this woman's on this one occasion, we do not prove Jesus to have been the only-begotten Son of God. We simply multiply instances in his case of acts of perfection such as are found in other lives also.

But even if the perfection of Jesus as a man proved him to be God (which we contend it would not do), can the perfection of Jesus be demonstrated? We think not. The mere multiplication of instances of perfect sayings, &c., does not prove anything beyond Jesus' perfection just to that extent, just at that time, &c., in the several cases cited. Our records of his life leave larger gaps than they fill in. Who could ever hope to demonstrate that the recorded perfections of Jesus have left behind them no unrecorded imperfections as a child, as a youth, as a minister of God? Is it not remarkable if so extraordinary a thing in human history as an absolutely perfect human life were lived for eighteen years without causing any remark or attracting any notice? Every act, word, look, thought divinely perfect, yet in no way distinguished from the ordinary and frequently imperfect acts, thoughts, looks, and words of other young men! Surely the probabilities are altogether against the idea of Jesus' absolute perfection.

What puzzles us most in God's world is the presence of imperfections, alike in the beauties of nature and in the most beautiful of human characters; in the midst of multiplied instances of perfection we are startled by imperfection. Those whom we love the most, our dearest children, our tenderest mother, father, friend, those who most reveal God to us, do they not also so clearly reveal perfection that, in the light of their own teaching, our souls are awakened to see even their faults? Only in such spirit of discipleship to Jesus, and with such love for him, would we venture to say that to call Herod a "fox," and others "a generation of vipers," and by bitter words—"ye serpents," "ye offspring of vipers," "ye hypocrites," "ye fools," &c., &c. —to rouse antagonists to fury was utterly inconsistent with the teaching of him who taught us the Lord's Prayer, "Judge not that ye be not judged," and "Love your enemies."

It is even to be noticed that in the synagogue at Nazareth Jesus' fellow-townsmen seem to have received him gladly, and listened gladly to him, and to have unanimously borne witness to the words of grace which proceeded out of his mouth, so long as they continued to be "words of grace." Only when his words became ungracious and suspicious did their feelings towards him change. Mr. Kingsland refers to "the fact" of the Nazarenes demanding, "Whatsoever we have heard done at Capernaum, do also here in thine own country." Is not this one more instance of blaming ether people for something done by Jesus himself? The words referred to (Luke iv. 23) crossed the lips of Jesus only, preceded by the suspicious taunt, "Doubtless ye will say." Apparently it was Jesus who "would not believe" at Nazareth.

WILFRED HARRIS.

OTHER times, other methods, we reflect, on reading of the new plan adopted by the Bolton and Farnworth Auxiliary of the Lancashire Congregational Union. The anniversary, once an important event, has been dwindling in interest for some years, and its meetings have been marked by diminutive attendances. The old style of meeting has been abandoned. Instead, a magic lantern has been procured, a lecture has been prepared on the history of the Congregational churches, to be delivered at each of the churches in the Union. Thus, for the first, every congregation is to have a lecture to itself—and in part very much for itself. For a special section of the lecture is devoted to the affairs of the particular church where it is read. In this attention is called to the amount of money received by the church from the Union, and of the amount contributed to the Union by the church. In one case, where the amount received was £400 in excess of the amount subscribed the audience was so impressed as to resolve at once to liquidate the debt. If such a result is to be obtained, other unions, without respect of creed, might well imitate the plan, which must tend also to increase the interest of each in the common concerns of all the churches.

FOR THE KING.

SOME follow Christ; some call Gautama king;
Some worship him who gave the stern Koran;
Others, by Science held, a firm-set ring,
Speak not of God, but live and die for man.

Each soldier to the standard of his heart
Brings loyal service, which still comes to Him
Who made the sun and holds the stars apart,
Whom we know not, for earthly eyes are dim.

In feudal times of peril and of skaith—
Those stormy days of which old poets sing—
Each followed his own chieftain to the death.
And yet all died together for the King.

MR. ARMSTRONG'S LECTURES.

A LARGE and deeply interested audience listened at Northampton on Tuesday to the sixth and last of Mr. Armstrong's Lectures in his course on "Theism and Agnosticism." The subject announced was "James Martineau and the outlook for to-day," and in setting forth the main lines of the religious philosophy of "the foremost exponent of Theism in England in the nineteenth century," the lecturer, by an analysis of his critical essays on John Stuart Mill, Herbert Spencer, and Tyndall, and a summary of the conclusions arrived at in the "Study of Religion," showed that the grounds of Martineau's Theism were the conviction of the existence of a Causal Will behind all phenomena and the experience of a Moral Law within. The great prophet-philosopher made his appeal to the religious experience of mankind, and showed that the God postulated by the intelligence and obeyed by the follower of Duty was one and the same, Almighty Power, Benevolence, Justice, and Love. There were limitations in the philosophy of Martineau. He probably underrated the value of Spencer's contribution to the world of thought. He seems to favour dualistic conceptions, rather than monistic, and he certainly gave the scantiest consideration to those psychological speculations which were just beginning to be heard as his last works were being published, and which now loom so large in the deliberations of all who observe the trend of modern thought. Still, just as he probably spent more hours in intellectual labour than any man the world has known, so, in the literature of man, he stands unequalled as he expounds the demands of our moral nature, as revealing the divine source and fount of goodness.

Considering the present outlook, Mr. Armstrong said that while moral "atheism" and practical "materialism" were only too evident, their intellectual correspondents were practically dead: the old orthodoxy was dissolving, being cut off from its intellectual basis, while the modern sacramentarianism was largely only another phase of scepticism. Agnosticism, on the one hand, shows a tendency to be profoundly dissatisfied with its own helplessness, and Theism, on the other, is laying more stress on the thought of the immanent than on that of the "external" God. The questions still go up, "Is there a God?" and "What is His relation to us?" These questions, while they can be answered on the lines of philosophic thought, will best be solved by our own practical life. "The pressure of competition, the struggle for wealth, the craze for pleasure, every evil passion, and all mere dead indifference are ever making for the decay of religion in our midst. These must be confronted by purity of heart and truth in the inward parts. These and these alone can permanently establish such belief in God as shall have not merely the cold precision of the intellect, but also the fervent glow of faith."

IT is the one sufficient proof of the grandeur and awfulness of our nature that we have faith in God, for no merely finite being can possibly believe the infinite.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

LAMPS.

My friends and I had been sailing up and down the sedge-fringed river all day, and we returned to our anchorage when the wind dropped and the shades of night began to creep over the land. Then we boiled our kettle, and had our tea in the peaceful stillness of eventide as the rooks came home to roost, and the owl issued from her hollow tree, and the bat skimmed the twilight air on noiseless wing, and the night-jar hunted the moths. We had to clean up the boat and pack things away so as to leave her shipshape. Deeper and deeper grew the shadows; the last bit of crimson in the west was swallowed up by sable night; stars hung like lamps in the sky, and a white mist rose stealthily from the marshes. We had to walk some distance along a narrow path with great care lest we should slip into the ditch on the one hand or the bog on the other; and all along I noticed the glow-worms like little points of fire shining as lamps on the damp ground. There were lamps in the heavens and lamps at my feet; and things like that always set me thinking.

When I was a boy my kind father used to take me by the hand and lead me amidst the beauties and marvels of nature at all hours, and thus arouse my curiosity and strengthen my love and appreciation by his own remarks concerning everything we saw. My father was not a learned man, for he went to school in days when education was but little valued, and when the cane was the principal instrument of training. But God had given him eyes to see with and ears to hear with, and a heart that was full of sympathy for all things bright and beautiful. So he taught me to love the birds and the trees and the flowers; to wander in imagination amongst the stars; to find lessons of striking force in the habits of the blind mole and in the steady light of the tiny glow-worm. It is, therefore, not surprising that I should now desire to stir the boys and girls of my acquaintance with the very same holy and loving thoughts.

I have had many a glow-worm in my hand. We used to bring them home and drop them in our garden. Small, insignificant-looking things they are; but they fulfil their destiny, and shed their light abroad when all is dark around. They are the creatures of God, and they obey His law. They, however, act instinctively; that is, they cannot choose between right and wrong as we can; they are not moral beings.

It is equally our duty to fulfil God's law, and obey His command. Like the glow-worms, we are intended to be as lamps, givers forth of light in the world; and if we do not honourably discharge the duty for which we were born, we are nothing more than lumber and encumbrance in a world which ought to be full of beauty and love.

Lampas is a Greek word meaning a torch, a beacon light, &c. So our English word "lamp" means that which gives forth light, illumination. Lamps are often referred to in the Bible, where they are used as figures for driving home great truths. Jesus wanted to know who would think of lighting a lamp and placing it under a bed or a bushel? Is it not the right place for it on a prominent stand, so that it may illuminate the whole room for the profit and convenience of everybody in it?

Those of you who have read history will know that in the old days—and the custom is still maintained in some countries—the tribes were called to arms by men called torch-bearers. They were swift runners who carried a burning torch from village to village, handing it on to fresh runners to carry it still further afield. Then, also, you know what the beacon lights were. On the hilltops huge fires were lighted, which were signals of alarm or of peace throughout the land. Before lighthouses were erected, beacons were kept burning on dangerous parts of the coast for the guidance of sailors in order that they might not steer their vessels on to treacherous rocks and be wrecked.

We nowadays walk about our streets at night with ease and comfort, thanks to the gas and electric light which abounds, and we forget that not so many years ago our cities and towns were in darkness at night save for a lantern hung here and there. Rich folk who could afford to do so carried their own lanterns, just as villagers do to-day in some remote country districts. If we habitually remembered these facts we should probably be a little more thankful for the increased comforts and conveniences of life which we enjoy.

You see, in those old days, when individuals carried lanterns, each one looked out for himself; but now we have grown in civic and social morality, and recognise that we must provide light for the whole community. Now what would happen at night time if during the day men were not working hard at the gasworks making gas and storing it away in those huge gasometers? What is the moral of that parable of the Ten Virgins with their lamps? It is no use having elaborate gas lamps in the streets if there is no gas in the meters. Lamps cannot discharge their functions if they are not trimmed and filled with oil.

If a man tells me he is a "light," I want to see some proof of it; he must shed his illumination abroad. We should have to give glow-worms another name if they left off glowing. And remember the fate of the foolish virgins. Was it not inconsistent of them to expect the others to share their scant supply of oil? Then when they went to buy oil for their lamps, the bridegroom came, and the feast commenced without them. Therefore, prepare for every possible opportunity, and remember that lamps without oil to burn in them are of little or no value.

TELL me not of the honour of belonging to a free country. I ask, does our liberty bear generous fruits? Does it exalt us in manly spirit, in public virtue, above countries trodden under foot by despotism? Tell me not of the extent of our territory. I care not how large it is if it multiply degenerate men. Speak not of our prosperity. Better be one of a poor people, plain in manners, revering God and respecting themselves, than belong to a rich country which knows no higher good than riches.—Channing.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

OUR correspondence columns this week bear witness to the gravity of the issues raised by the forty-five Trustees of Manchester College, at whose instance a special Trustees' meeting is to be held at Oxford on Tuesday the 29th inst., to deal with a resolution to be moved on their behalf, and an amendment, of which notice has been given on behalf of the committee. The resolution is described in a "Historical Statement," issued in the name of the Forty-five, as "affirming the Nonconformist and Non-subscribing character of the Institution." The committee's amendment proposes to meet what is, in fact, a vote of want of confidence, by a declaration that the College adheres to its fundamental principles, and that the Trustees "will do nothing to limit for themselves and their successors the freedom the College has inherited and has enjoyed for nearly a century and a quarter."

That there is any need, at this time of day, to re-affirm the Nonconformist and Non-subscribing character of the College, many of its friends will hear with a good deal of astonishment and incredulity. But evidently there is need in many minds of a clearer apprehension of the true meaning of the fundamental principle of Non-subscription, and of the broad lines on which the College was originally founded and has to this day been administered.

Both parties in this controversy appeal to the original declaration of the founders of the College, at Manchester, in 1786. On Feb. 22 of that year, it was unanimously agreed "that an Academy should be established in Manchester, on a plan affording a full and systematic Course of Education for Divines, and preparatory instructions for the other learned Professions, as well as for Civil and Commercial Life. This institution will be opened to young men of every religious denomination from whom no test or confession of faith will be required." And in the following September, preaching at the inauguration of the Academy, Dr. THOMAS BARNES, the first Principal, made this declaration:—

"Educated in the principles of Liberty, civil and religious, and deeming those principles essential to every higher interest of man, you have wished to form a Seminary of Education which shall breathe the same spirit, and which shall thus serve, in the most effectual manner, the cause of truth and goodness. Hence you have formed your Institution upon the most liberal and generous basis, guarded by no jealous subscriptions, and open without suspicion or fear to all who wish to enjoy the advantages of science, unfettered and free. You regard it as your duty, you demand it as your birthright, you glory in it as your privilege, to judge for yourselves on every subject of Science, and above all of Religion, and to act according to your own convictions. . . . Yours is not the cause of any party. You rank yourselves under no distinguishing name. The liberty which you claim for yourselves you extend with equal latitude to others. The burden to which you will not submit you will never impose. You plead for the equal universal dominion of reason, of conscience, and of truth. To these great interests alone you consecrate this Seminary."

It will thus be seen that the original purpose of the founders was by no means confined to the establishment of a training school for ministers; that, however, remained the central purpose, and it is with their method of carrying out that purpose that we are here concerned.

In giving judgment in 1853 that the Trustees of the College had the right to remove it from Manchester to London, or to any other place that was thought desirable, the then Master of the Rolls spoke of the College as specially devoted "to the class or denomination of persons called English Presbyterian Protestant Dissenters," and further declared his belief that the original design of the Institution was "to train young men of that denomination of Dissenters to the sacred ministry." But the leaders of "that denomination," in founding the College, declared that it should be open "to young men of every religious denomination, from whom no test or confession of faith will be required," and it cannot be denied (though the "Historical Statement" makes as light of it as possible) that some of the first divinity students were designated as belonging to "the Church."

As a matter of fact, those "English Presbyterian Protestant Dissenters" believed in the open principle, and so founded their College. They wished to afford to young men preparing for the ministry of their own congregations the best possible education, and that, they were steadfastly convinced, must be given and received on the principle which governed the whole of their religious life. "It is of unspeakable importance," said Dr. BARNES in the inaugural sermon, "to the interests of religion that those who are to be the assertors of its truth, the guardians of its purity, and, under God, the instruments of its power, shall feel its noblest influence upon themselves, that they shall study its doctrines free from the control of human decision and authority, and that they shall with all simplicity follow wherever truth and reason point the way." Thus they founded a free College, even as their life was given to the service of free churches, and to the maintenance of a principle wider in its scope than the limits of any sect or denomination. They held that they should best serve the interests of their own people by absolute trust in that principle of spiritual freedom, and they had no wish to confine the benefits of the College to their own particular circle. If others would accept its principle and methods they should be free to come in: "The liberty which you claim for yourselves you extend with equal latitude to others." The College was dedicated simply "to Truth, to Liberty, to Religion."

That is the great tradition we have inherited both in the College and in the churches, which are based on the same principle of Non-subscription and Spiritual freedom. If the resolution of the Forty-five did indeed merely re-affirm that principle, we cannot see how any objection could be taken by any friends of the College, though the need for it would hardly be apparent; but the actual resolution has a long preamble, and the declaration involves a limitation of purpose which both the Committee and the Principal and Professors (with the exception of Emeritus Professor UPTON) judge to be contrary to the fundamental principle of the College.

The resolution is, in fact, aimed at two causes of offence, or of misgiving, on the part of a certain number of the Trustees. Its supporters maintain that the bursaries of the College ought to be confined to students who pledge themselves, and throughout their College course hold to the purpose, to enter the ministry of a non-subscribing church; they also maintain that a member of the Church of England cannot consistently hold a position on the teaching staff of the College.

With regard to this latter point, it appears to us that a clergyman in orders, pledged to the doctrinal articles of the Church of England as the final and dogmatic standard of belief, cannot consistently accept the fundamental principle of the College, or a place among its teachers. Both teachers and taught must be free simply to follow truth. On the other hand, the principle of freedom demands that the acceptance of orthodox rather than heterodox conclusions should not be made a disability, or lead to the ejection of any trusted teacher from the College.

The matter of bursaries must be governed by the same principle, though it may become a question of administration and resources whether the College ought to offer to maintain students who come up to receive its training, or whether this additional "charity" should be confined to the members of a particular community. The College is clearly established as a public institution, not as a sectarian seminary. The evidence on this head appears to us incontrovertible; its benefits are confined to no sect or party, and its teachers have consistently maintained that its students for the ministry must be free to choose according to their own conscientious conviction to what Church their service shall be given. Thus in his Visitor's Address in 1884 the late Charles Beard declared to the divinity students:—

When you leave this place the College does not designate you to the service of any particular church. It would be seriously disappointed were you to decline from ministerial service altogether, and hardly less so were you to perform it with perfunctory obedience and only half a heart. But you are free to serve GOD, and CHRIST, and man in whatever religious connection you will; and the one unfaithfulness of which you can be guilty to your Alma Mater is to be untrue to her traditions of freedom, and piety, and dutifulness.

That is the principle which the proposed resolution would subvert. Its supporters declare that if, in the course of his studies, a student is conscientiously led to the conclusion that he must enter the ministry of the Church of England, he ought no longer to receive the benefit of the College bursary. The Committee, on the contrary, have maintained what they believe to be the true principle of the College, and have held that a student, whatever honest conclusions he arrives at, if he be willing to complete his course and conscientiously use to the full the opportunities of independent study which the College affords, ought to be really free to follow his convictions without having the weight of a serious pecuniary disability thrown into the scale on one side or the other.

These are points on which it is eminently desirable that a full and frank discussion should take place, that an end should be made of the misgivings and misunderstandings which prevail in certain quarters. If such is the result of the special meeting of the Trustees we shall not regret that it was called. What is above all things to be hoped is that the Trustees "will do nothing to limit for themselves and their successors the freedom the College has inherited and has enjoyed for nearly a century and a quarter."

THE "SEEDSOWER" NOTES ON MANCHESTER COLLEGE.

THE November Seedsower, in a column of "Notes and Jottings," speaks of the establishment of the Faculty of Theology in the Victoria University of Manchester as marking the beginning of a new era in the study of theology in England, and adds: "There is nothing that the training for the ministry needs more, in face of the moral and intellectual needs of the present day, than the breadth of view which it is the function of a university to cultivate, and to which sect life can very seldom attain."

This ideal of a Free Faculty of Theology, the writer goes on to say, has been familiar for more than a hundred years to the friends of Manchester College, which is now at Oxford. The rest of the Seedsower notes, referring to Manchester College, we take the liberty of reproducing entire:—

"Probably nowhere else has the teaching of theology been so free from sectarian bias, and no pressure has ever been exerted upon its students to accept service in any particular denomination. Every man has been left honourably free to go where conscience and reason led him. The College has faced the risks as well as the privileges of freedom with a brave heart, and it must view the acceptance of its principle by the most modern of our universities with profound gratitude.

"As the historical memory of most people is rather a short one, it may not be out of place to recall the fact that the Dissenting Academies, of which Manchester College is the lineal descendant, were remarkable for their inclusiveness. They wished primarily to include the Nonconformist, who was shut out from the ancient Universities, but they were careful to exclude nobody. Within their limits they were Universities without royal charter or religious tests. Gilbert Wakefield tells us that during his connection with the Academy at Warrington about one-third of the students belonged to the Established Church. At the inaugural meeting of the Manchester Academy (the present College under another name), it was stated expressly that it would be open to young men of all denominations; and a hundred years later, at the centenary meeting, Mr. Gordon was able to use these remarkable words:—"We cannot call it either Presbyterian or Unitarian exclusively, inasmuch as it has always welcomed with open heart and hand students of every religious body. So it was in Frankland's time; so it was at Warrington; so at Kendal; so at Manchester. I think the name which stands second on the roll of divinity students of Manchester College is that of one who is specified as a student of 'Divinity in the Church.' That addition shows that, in the sense of extending more than a transient hospitality to those whose views may differ very widely from the cherished convictions entertained by its founders, this College rightly claims to be an undenominational institution."

——

"It is well from time to time to refresh our minds with these noble historical memories. Nothing can be a better check upon our impatience, or the temptation to be suspicious of our freedom when it leads to results which we do not like. Manchester College has never tried to make a creed of its own undenominationalism or to erect non-subscription into a test. It does not aspire to be a denominational seminary even for the most liberal of the sects. It is its breadth, its tolerance, its theological hospitality which distinguish it, and it is for this very reason the best training ground for men who are anxious to devote themselves to the service of liberal religion. No matter where they may minister in after life, or whatever name they may prefer to assume, if once they have felt its spirit and been kindled by its ideal, their influence will be always in the direction of strong personal conviction combined with sympathy and breadth."

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

SIR,—Dr. Drummond's letter in your last issue calls in question the veracity of the statement made in an explanatory address which has been sent to all the trustees of Manchester College. I will leave those to whom Mr. Addis made the statement to deal with that point, but at the interview a deputation had with the officers of the College in December last, attention was called to this statement, and I am told that Mr. Addis has since ceased to take any part in the chapel services.

The moving trustees, however, in requesting a special meeting did not intend raising any other issue than that covered by the resolution to be moved by Mr. John Harrison, which simply re-affirms the old principles upon which the College was founded, and, if passed, will prevent College funds being used to maintain and support any professor or student who has become an adherent of any church governed by creeds or doctrinal trusts.

There is no wish or attempt to limit the freedom of the committee in the management of the College, or to restrict "the large and sympathetic outlook upon the world of thought," or to interfere in the slightest degree "with the principle of perfect freedom of mind and conscience in both teachers and taught." The traditional policy of the College has been departed from without the knowledge or consent of the Trustees, and I fail to see why those dissenting from this grave departure have not the same right to hold their views, and have them fairly considered as the committee itself. I say nothing about the action of the Professors beyond this, that it is the only form of coercion they can exert, and comes with a bad grace from those who are so loud in their claim for perfect freedom. We ought to discuss this question on its merits, and without threats from the servants of the College, and I for one will not accept the Amendment, if carried under such conditions, as a fair settlement of the question at issue.

F. MONKS.

Warrington, Nov. 7, 1904.

[As Mr. Monks refers to the Professors' letter, which has been circulated with the notices of the meeting, it seems right that it should be published here also. We take a very different view of the letter from that of our correspondent. To us it would have seemed most unfair to the Trustees if the Professors, regarding the proposed resolution as they do, had failed to let the gravity of the situation be known.—ED. INQ.]

LETTER TO THE COMMITTEE OF MANCHESTER COLLEGE.

Oxford, October 13, 1904.

GENTLEMEN,—We have learned with grave concern that a special meeting of trustees is to be convened for the purpose of considering a resolution which, if passed, would affect very seriously the position of our College. It appears to us that this resolution, supported by imperfect and consequently (though, of course, unintentionally) misleading quotations, would subvert what we understood to be the conditions of our engagement and the settled constitution of the College, as it would unquestionably rebuke the principle of perfect freedom of mind and conscience in both teachers and taught which we have always maintained as fundamental, and in accordance with which we have acted whenever occasion has arisen. It was on this understanding that we came to Oxford, and this principle we have consistently maintained in the face of the University. The infringement of it would place us in a most painful dilemma. We hope that all who value the large and sympathetic outlook upon the world of thought which we have inherited, and object to all penalties for conscientious convictions, will make a point of attending the meeting, and, as defenders of a sacred trust, defeat by a decisive vote this attempt to restrict our ancient liberties, and to lower our College from its old position of a "public institution" into a sectarian seminary.

You are at liberty, in your collective capacity, to make any use of this letter that you may think judicious.—We are, Gentlemen, yours faithfully,

JAMES DRUMMOND,
WILLIAM ADDIS,
J. ESTLIN CARPENTER,
J. EDWIN ODGERS,
L. P. JACKS.

SIR,—It is curious that a "pamphlet professing to emanate from the forty-five trustees who signed a recent requisition' should be called "anonymous," especially as a copy of that requisition, with the names attached, was sent to every trustee. No professor and no member of committee was asked to sign. But, though my name is not upon it, I am in full sympathy with both the requisition and the resolution affirming the Nonconformist and Non-subscribing character of the College.

The pamphlet referred to is the "Explanatory Address," which was issued in connection with a "Historical Statement," by authority of meetings to which the forty-five trustees were summoned.

The paragraph about Mr. Addis, containing a statement which is now said to be "not true," recounts one of two "significant circumstances in the recent history of the College" which "seemed to call for remonstrance." Such remonstrance was made on December 21 last to the officers by a deputation (of whom I was one, not being then on the committee) representing dissatisfied trustees. The complete statement was as follows :—

> One of the professorial staff (Rev. William Addis), elected to the Chair of Old Testament and Hebrew while a minister of one of our ancient Free Congregations, and having since become a communicant of the Church of England, was occupying the College pulpit in his turn, though it was his own declared wish to be relieved from the duty. Mr. Addis also held (as he still holds) the responsible office of Head of the Residence, in which the students for the Non-subscribing Ministry are, unless specially exempted, required to reside.

That Mr. Addis was occupying the College pulpit in his turn is matter of history, which anyone can verify. That he wished to be relieved of this duty is evident from the fact, that no less than two months after the date of the deputation he had, for the sake of his own comfort, formally asked to be set free. The only question remaining then is whether that wish had been declared before Dec. 21. He expressed it to one of the requisitionists so far back as June 26, 1903. And on March 21 last, in a frank and friendly conversation which I had with Mr. Addis, so that he might understand what was really in our minds, I informed him of the objection which had been taken to his conducting services about which he had declared his own discomfort and unwillingness. That was the opportunity for contradiction or correction, but none was made.

What seems to have been denied as "not true" was an interpretation of the statement for which there was no warrant in the pamphlet, viz., as Dr. Drummond puts it, that he "compelled Mr. Addis to do what, if he had been left to his own good taste, he would not have done." No one would dream of the Principal compelling an honourable man to do what he felt wrong; and no one has suggested that Mr. Addis formally asked to be relieved until after the deputation went to the officers.

It is a small matter that is under consideration, no doubt, and it does not touch the essential question of the propriety of an avowed Churchman occupying the College pulpit, and being Head of the Residence in which the students for a Free Ministry are obliged to reside. But when a statement is said to be "not true," accuracy or truthfulness is impugned, and a small matter may assume greater importance.

Mr. Addis's voluntary withdrawal from conducting the College services lessened the strain of the situation. The further objection as regards the Headship of the Residence, though strongly felt, would not have been pressed, as was intimated both to him and to the committee. But his own recent action in signing a manifesto which most of the professors have thought it proper to issue to the trustees urging them "to make a point of attending the meeting," and "defeat by a decisive vote" the resolution of the memorialists, affirming that the College stands for Nonconformity and Non-subscription, has necessarily brought his position into controversy, which none regrets more than I.

C. J. STREET.

Sheffield, Nov. 9, 1904.

SIR,—As I hear, to my profound regret, that certain passages in my letter to Mr. Street, which has been printed and circulated, have been supposed to refer to the Rev. William Addis, and to imply a charge that he has made use of his position in Manchester College to urge upon the students his own doctrinal and ecclesiastical convictions, I beg you will allow me space to say that nothing was farther from my thoughts than such a statement or implication; which, indeed, I well know to be quite contrary to the fact.

My letter did not refer, and was not intended to refer, to the now existing condition of the College. It was written to explain why I was unable to sign the letter sent by the professors to the committee. The chief cause of my inability was that it seemed evident to me that the main purpose of that letter was to induce the Trustees to declare that the committee is free to treat the question of subscription to ecclesiastical formulæ as an unessential matter, both in the granting of bursaries and in the appointment of teachers. I could not feel in accord with this purpose; but what I said in my letter had reference only to possible future appointments of conforming clergymen to professorships in the College. If such an appointment were made with the full knowledge that the professor was "creed-bound," as it is called, it would not, I maintained in the letter, be consistent with either the dignity or the traditions of the College to impose any restrictions upon that professor's entire freedom to express his opinion to his pupils; and that he might feel it his duty to use that freedom in the way I described in the letter.

But the case of Mr. Addis is totally different from this. In the first place, he has signed no articles; and in the second place, when he was appointed he was the minister of a Nonconformist congregation, and if at that time he felt strong leanings towards the Anglican Church, the committee, I am inclined to think, were not aware of it. Under these somewhat peculiar circumstances Mr. Addis has taken the course which all who are well acquainted with his character would have expected from him. He has made it a point of honour never to seek to draw his pupils from their own to his ideas on Christianity; and this self-imposed obligation he has, I believe, invariably observed.

The warm admiration and affection felt for Mr. Addis, both by the teachers and the taught, have certainly not been kindled by any zeal which he has shown in making proselytes to his own church, for this has been conspicuously absent, but simply by the evident fact that he is a true Christian gentleman, who feels deep personal interest in the students, and who in his generous efforts to aid them from the rich resources of his scholarship constantly goes on the road of kindly service very far beyond what is required from him by his official position in the College.

CHARLES B. UPTON.

SIR,—If the decision as to what is now the right course for the Trustees of Manchester College to pursue depends on the interpretation of documents and the legal meaning of Trusts, most of us would be ill-prepared to give an independent opinion; but if, as many of us believe, our Trust is really an open trust, made and kept as open by our predecessors as they could find words to express their intention, then our action at the coming meeting depends upon what we then and there consider to be the truest expression in word and deed of the spirit of our fathers.

Our inherited protest is against bonds which exclude. Shall we begin to make this plain by excluding the largest religious body in our land? Our boast has been that our College was "open to all denominations" who were willing to come and study and search with us. Are we now going to stultify this by adding: "But if your search leads you in such or such a direction our comradeship must be at an end?" MARGARET J. SHAEN.

SIR,—As it will be impossible for more than a few speakers to address the meeting on the 29th inst., will you kindly permit me, as a trustee, to state one or two practical reasons why I think that, if the resolution be passed, Unitarians and those interested in liberal religion will themselves be very badly hit?

That resolution will declare that the College is

A non-subscribing Protestant Dissenting Institution; that its essential purpose is the training of students for a Ministry of Religion in which no theological test is imposed; and that no portion of the funds of the College can properly be applied for any purpose inconsistent with the principles of Nonconformity and Non-subscription.

Now, a study of the anonymous pamphlet shows that this is avowedly designed to exclude from the teaching staff and from the grant-aided body of students, all subscribers to doctrine, all ministers, and all intending to become ministers of doctrinally bound churches. This will, of course, cover Unitarian as well as Trinitarian trust-bound churches. Now, suppose the committee should desire to offer a professorship (say) in ecclesiastical history to the present or future Bishop of the State-established confessional Unitarian Church of Hungary, they would at once be absolutely blocked by this resolution. Is it really intended thus to excommunicate our Hungarian brethren and tie the hands of the committee? Or, suppose, again, they wished to give a bursary to a Hungarian student who declared his intention to enter the ministry of the same doctrinally-bound Unitarian State Church. This resolution would debar the committee from granting such an exhibition. For that church is a State-established Church, it is not non-conforming or dissenting, it is a confessional doctrinally bound Church. Are we really prepared to pass a resolution which would work so harshly against our own co-religionists?

Let us come to our own country. There are a few churches bound by Unitarian close trusts. Is a Manchester College student by accepting a bursary in honour pledged not to accept the pulpit of such a Unitarian church when he leaves the College?

Again, suppose a minister of such a bound Unitarian church should be wanted to act as a professor at Manchester College, is the fact that he comes from a tied church to be a fatal disqualification?

Think, for a moment, of the absurd anomaly of a minister of a non-subscribing Trinitarian church (such as are many of the Congregationalist churches) being permitted by this resolution to become a professor, while a minister of a close-trust Unitarian chapel is disqualified; of a non-subscribing, but avowedly Trinitarian student intended for an open-trust Congregational chapel receiving a bursary, but not a student who declared his intention to seek the ministry of a doctrinally bound Unitarian chapel.

Once more, suppose the committee desired to secure an orthodox or subscribing Rabbi to fill a chair in Rabbinical or Talmudic literature; or, imagine that they wished (as they very well might) to extend the study of comparative religion by having a Mohammedan scholar to expound the history and principles of Islam, &c. (and so with other world-religions), would not this resolution land us in a hopeless impasse?

It seems to me, quite apart from theoretical and historical considerations, that the resolution is practically a dangerous and disastrously crippling declaration, subversive of the common sense of the situation and of every large inclusive idea of freedom. It is, in fact, a vicious boomerang that will hit a far more damaging blow at us than at the object at which it is aimed. I cannot understand "Freedom" in this negative exclusive paralysing sense. The liberty we claim must surely be liberally, magnanimously, and comprehensively interpreted, and any attempt to exercise it in a sectarian spirit will but defeat the very ends which the framers of the resolution are striving, in my opinion so unwisely, to achieve.

J. M. LLOYD THOMAS.

Nottingham, November 7.

ERRATUM.—In the letter printed last week from Mr. T. A. Colfox and the Rev. H. S. Solly, the word "subsequently" should be omitted. This correction was received last week but too late for the change to be made.

OUR CHURCHES AND SOCIAL PROBLEMS.

SIR,—In their discussion of social problems I often wish our religious friends were less given to the general and the abstract, and would sometimes condescend to the particular and the concrete. Mr. Harwood insists upon it that the business of the church is "to set before its members true principles of life," and "to inspire an enthusiastic faith in those principles."

Now, let us take a concrete case. In a certain town of 30,000 people there are twenty-five Christian churches, and twenty-five bakers' shops. The Christian churches are all of them teaching, and their members all of them believe in the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, and they are all agreed that brotherly beneficence and mutual helpfulness are the true principles of life, both individual and social. Most of the bakers believe in these principles as much as anybody. But they are all cutting each others' throats. A few of the financially strongest, the ablest, the most unscrupulous are gradually forging ahead, and monopolising the trade, and making fortunes. The rest are gradually going to the wall, and, as they go, find themselves under compulsion to do things that many of them detest—to pay the lowest wages for the longest hours, and to keep pace with cutting prices by adulterating their bread, and, as far as practicable, by pinching the weight of their loaves.

That is no fancy picture. Everybody knows that those bakers fairly represent nine-tenths of the businesses all around us, and that out of this state of things come these recurring periods of unemployment and distress, and a chronic condition of home life that is appalling. The bakers in their trouble come to the churches, and want to know what they are to do. "We believe in your principles," say the poor men, "we would fain live honest and upright lives, and we like that teaching of yours that, 'The soul of all improvement is the improvement of the soul.' We like your principles, but how are we to apply them?"

"Oh," reply the churches, "that is not our business. All we can reasonably be expected to do is to put before our members true principles of life, and to inspire enthusiastic faith in them. Bless your souls! if we were to begin practical application on any effective scale, there would soon be wigs on the green. Even now our churches are none of them so strong and influential as we should like them to be, and if we were to begin discussing and advocating specific schemes, why, we should split up in endless divisions. It is our business to teach you true principles; you yourselves must find out how to apply them."

That is really the attitude of the Christian churches towards all the social problems of our time, and I should like to ask my friend Mr. Harwood whether he considers it an attitude at all likely to inspire enthusiastic faith? My own deep conviction is that so long as they maintain that attitude the churches must expect that their influence will dwindle away.

G. F. MILLIN.

Brixton, November 6.

SIR,—In view of the discussion at the last Council meeting Mr. Harwood's letter may be regarded as reflecting the opinion of the majority. The difference between them and the dissentients may be summed up in a phrase:—The first consider that their religious communal duties may be discharged through politics, the other regards this field as insufficient, and would make action spring from a common religious ideal. Everyone knows how in politics the religious spirit is crushed by party passion and personal ambitions.

A faith that supplies no common ground of action beyond its own support stands self-condemned, for it admits that other faiths have equal practical results. If other churches had acted on Mr. Harwood's theory how much poorer would England be to-day? No Salvation Army, or Church Army, no sisters of of the poor, no shelters, no refuges, no homes for the aged or dying! I refrain from adding to the list.

I would respectfully demur to Mr. Harwood's claim to the endorsement of Jesus for his method. Our Lord (I use the phrase in the old Unitarian sense Eph. iv.), always blended, when necessary, temporal with spiritual blessings, and when, after the multitude had followed and listened to him all day, his disciples would have sent them away to buy bread, he said: "Not so; give ye them to eat!"

"SUFFERING IN THE CREATOR."

SIR,—May I direct the attention of your readers to the following passage in the remarkable article, by Sir Oliver Lodge, on "Sin," in the last Hibbert Journal, as it throws light on a discussion which appeared in your columns some time ago upon the subject of "God's Sacrifice":—

But whatever be the law with other religions, the sacrifice of Christ has convinced the Western world of sin to a unique degree, of its reality and dire consequence, of its unreasonableness, its aspect as a disease which must be cured—with the knife if need be, but cured; we have learnt that it is foreign to the universe, it is not the will of God, it is not due to His caprice or amusement, or dictation, or predestination, or pagan example; it is something which gives even Him pain and suffering; it is something to be rid of, and there is no peace or joy to be had until unity of will is secured and past rebellions are forgiven.

The sin of the creature involves suffering in the Creator. The whole of existence is so bound together that disease in one part means pain throughout. This is the element of truth in the vicariousness of suffering, and in extension of suffering to the Highest; but it is not vicariously penal, nor is it propitiatory.

The italics are mine, and I will only add that in this passage Sir Oliver Lodge states more clearly what one who took part in the late discussion endeavoured to say in protesting against the notion that "sacrifice on the part of God is unintelligible," and that "Deity cannot suffer."

KENTISH TOWN SOCIAL CLUB.

AN APPEAL.

SIR,—Six or seven months ago five young men presented themselves quite spontaneously at Clarence-road, and asked whether they could not have some sort of a meeting on Sunday afternoons. Of course the answer was in the affirmative. Since then the meetings have been regularly held, and the numbers have more than quadrupled. A suggestion that some place should be found which could be opened every night, and for a couple of hours at mid-day was made, and warmly welcomed by the young men themselves. A house has been taken at 62, Kentish Town-road, and the Free Christian Church Social Club and Institute will be opened during the present month. The expense will be considerable, and the church at Kentish Town is not a wealthy one. We venture to express the hope that this promising enterprise will commend itself to the generosity of friends interested in the welfare of young men earning their own living, and who are themselves giving of their own goodwill as much as they can afford to secure the place of meeting, such as is above described. Inquiras will be gladly answered and donations receivedby

YORKSHIRE UNITARIAN UNION.

SIR,—Some of your readers may perhaps be interested to know that arrangements are now made to hold public meetings at Barnsley on November 18 and 22 and December 6 and 9, when addresses will be delivered expository of our "Unitarian Gospel." I hope also to organise similar meetings at Keighley after Christmas. I should esteem it a favour if those of your readers who know Unitarians residing at either of these places would send me their names and addresses. Such information would assist me immensely in organising this new work. JOHN ELLIS.

SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

SIR,—I shall be obliged if you will enable me through your columns to make known to Sunday-school teachers an offer of the committee to send out at a reduced price the following Biblical Manuals, if ordered before Dec. 15. "Prophecies of the Captivity," "Galatians," "Mark," "Philippians," and "Jeremiah," to be forwarded carriage paid at 8s. per dozen. The volumes can be assorted.

The committee are anxious that these valuable handbooks should come into the hands of those for whom they were prepared, and they make this offer in the hope that where the cost was an obstacle, the reduction made will remove it.

"ASSOCIATION SUNDAY."

SIR,—May I be allowed to call the attention of your readers to the collections on behalf of the work of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, which will be made in a large number of our churches on Sunday, November 20?

The operations of the Association are large and wide-spread, and I hope there will be a liberal response to the appeals which will be made by a great many of our ministers. Association Sunday offers an admirable opportunity for directing general notice to the excellent work which is being done at home and abroad.

There are not a few Unitarians who live too far away from any of our places of worship to attend on the Sunday. Need I say that I shall be glad if they will transmit their contributions to me at Essex Hall, if they do not already subscribe? OSWALD NETTLEFOLD, Treasurer.

MUSINGS.

BY A MINISTER.

VII.

ROBINSON is never tired of throwing me back on the primitive church. Let it be a question of doctrine, or of ritual, he is all for having everything as it was in the apostolic age. I asked him once which of the primitive churches he meant—Jerusalem, Antioch, or, say, Corinth—but Robinson does not read Weizsäcker, and to him they are all one.

I try to imagine myself a member of this primitive church. I am living in the year 60 A.D. If I am at Jerusalem, I am very zealous of the law, I worship in the temple, I am a Hebrew of the Hebrews, with a very proper distrust of my Hellenist brethren, and an unconquerable aversion from all Gentile converts. If I am at Antioch, as a Gentile convert I have no great liking for my Jewish brother. His Mosaic ordinances offend me; especially do I rebel against restriction and regulations concerning a matter so simple as the use of meat as food. If I am at Corinth, I am a member of a church small enough to be housed under a private roof, but large enough to be split up into rival parties under separate leaders. Here again I am met by this same difficulty as to what I may eat, and what I may not eat. I am a dock labourer, or a street porter, and, for a good meal, knowing that an idol is nothing, I am ready to sit at meat even in an idol's temple. I do not shrink from noisy love-feasts, and I am often present when each one has a psalm, a teaching, a revelation, and there is much confusion. A letter comes to us from Paul of Tarsus, but he is only one of our leaders, his letter is only one amongst many letters, and as a letter we receive it, read it, and put it aside.

Whichever of these Churches it may be that I belong to, it has no settled organisation—instruction is in the hands of wandering teachers, discipline rests with a loosely constituted board. Our Scriptures are the books of the Old Testament, but we do not possess them all; passages are read to us from such portions as fall in our way. Besides these we have the Logia of the Lord and the stories of His mighty works, but these we know chiefly by repeating them to each other. A doctrine also we have, but it has not yet been stated in such terms as to attract thoughtful and cultivated minds. To the wise it is foolishness. I am doing my best to think with Robinson, but I cannot see in any one of these churches my spiritual home.

I come back to the Christian inheritance, as we have it now. Poetry and art and learning and saintly habit have given to it of their best. Martyrs, fathers, monks, schoolmen, popes, abbots, bishops, priests, nuns, friars, pastors, preachers, reformers, have all witnessed in turn. Out of heresy has come definition; out of philosophy expression; out of theology system. We are the richer, even for the errors which we have rejected. We cannot without loss spare a clause in the Catholic creed, or a chapter of its history. The theory of the Church has had its place amongst the theories of government, and has at once developed and corrected the theory of the State. We are debtors to the Papist, and the Protestant, and the Sceptic. We are heirs of faith, and happily also of superstition. Through it all we have come to a larger comprehension of the stature of the fulness of Christ, and to a deeper understanding of the Kingdom of God. We can no more go back to the primitive church than the full-grown tree can return to the least of all seeds.

And yet Robinson, in a sense, and in no small sense, is right. There are indispensable notes of a true Church, and for these at their clearest we turn to the primitive church. They stand out there, for all men to see, recorded from the first, as "the apostles' teaching and fellowship, the breaking of bread and the prayers." Teaching—the very words of the Lord Jesus, repeated as they were spoken, and applied in plain homily to daily life; Fellowship—a living partnership in truth and hope and joy and blessing, a common life as well as a common faith, a sharing and distribution of worldly goods; The Breaking of Bread—a perpetual reminder of Him who was still present in their midst, a reminder also of their unity and equality in Him, and of that bread from heaven which was their spiritual sustenance; The Prayers—the old familiar service-forms, and those new devotions inspired by one who had taught them to pray as He also prayed. It is for us to ask ourselves whether these four notes are still the unmistakable marks of the Christian congregation.

Robinson, then, is right, but he would do well to bear in mind Bishop Lightfoot's warning, and be careful not to invest the primitive church, good as it was, with "ideal excellence."

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Bristol: Lewins Mead Domestic Mission.—The first congregational "At Home" was held in the Mission Hall on Monday evening last, when a goodly company assembled, and a very pleasant evening was spent. Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Robinson, together with the members of their family, made every one welcome, and were well supported by several members of the committee. Amongst those present were Mr. and Mrs. Castling (whose connection with the Mission extends over a period of fifty-two years). Pictures, microscope, and glees by the choir were part of the evening's entertainment.

Canterbury.—Through the kindness of the Provincial Assembly and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, who have promised grants, an arrangement has been made with the Rev. J. H. Smith, formerly of India, now at Deal, to conduct morning service in the Blackfriars Chapel during the ensuing year, commencing on December 4. The congregation would take this opportunity of expressing sincere thanks to all those ministers and laymen who have so kindly "supplied" the pulpit during the enforced absence of their late minister.

Chester.—On the 26th ult., the Rev. Dr. Warschauer preached in Matthew Henry's Chapel on "Agnosticism and Religion." In the course of his sermon he said that agnosticism suffered most from those who presumed to speak in its name without real right to do so—the camp-followers, in search of inexpensive intellectual fame. But the awakened spirit of criticism in application to history had been, broadly speaking, of the very greatest benefit to religion. It had insisted upon truth, and had awakened the slumbering theological scientist to the duty of not making statements except on sound evidence of their truth. Agnosticism afforded a welcome relief from the imposing familiarity with the ways of the Most High displayed by all orthodoxies of every time. From the results of criticism, which had destroyed the old dogmas and compelled a greater modesty of affirmation, faith would come out unscathed and invested with a deeper sanctity than when men thought they had found God unto perfection. On Sunday, Nov. 6, the 204th Chapel Anniversary, sermons were preached by the Rev. L. P. Jacks, of Oxford, Editor of the Hibbert Journal.

Elland.—The annual tea and meeting were held in the schoolroom at Christ Church on Saturday last, the attendance being satisfactory. The occasion was taken to welcome the Rev. John Ellis as District Minister of the Yorkshire Unitarian Union. At the meeting in the chapel after tea, Councillor A. Whitworth, of Huddersfield, presided, supported by the Revs. A. W. Fox, Wm. Mellor, E. Lockett, and John Ellis, Messrs. J. Beaumont (secretary), A. Wadsworth (Halifax), Fred. Clayton (Leeds), and others. After devotional exercises, the chairman opened the proceedings with words of encouragement to the members of the Elland congregation on the prospect of having a leader, after being so long acting upon their own responsibility. They had had their trials, but they had remained united, and he trusted they would now be successful as a church in Elland. He most heartily welcomed Mr. Ellis as their spiritual guide. Mr. Beaumont submitted a statement as to the past and present history of Elland Church, with a list of previous ministers, especially noting the fact that their present pulpit was that occupied by Oliver Heywood. He thanked the British and Foreign Association in London and the Yorkshire Unitarian Union, for the generous assistance which had been rendered, and trusted they as a congregation would show they were worthy of it. On behalf of the congregation he most heartily joined in the welcome to Mr. Ellis. The other ministers present gave helpful addresses, and Mr. Fred Clayton strongly advocated the claims of the Sunday-school, urging members of the church to volunteer as teachers. Mr. A. Wadsworth having added a few words of encouragement, Mr. Ellis thanked all present for their good wishes. He was assured of the support and help of the lay preachers, and should do his utmost to bring about and strengthen a feeling of fellowship in each of the congregations over which he had supervision; he should seek to introduce week-night services and lectures where possible; and they were next week to take the Unitarian message to Barnsley. He should do all in his power to carry out the work entrusted to him, and felt assured of any assistance he might require from them. He again thanked them most heartily for their welcome and good wishes. The chairman having been thanked for his services, singing and prayer concluded a most hopeful and encouraging meeting.

Glossop.—Under the auspices of the B. & F.U.A. a special mission was held on Sunday last. The Rev. J. E. Manning conducted the services, and gave two addresses in exposition of the Unitarian faith. There were good congregations, the numbers being 126 and 150 respectively, including a fair proportion of strangers. A large quantity of literature was distributed at the door of the church, and £8 was collected in aid of the mission and of the funds of the Association.

London: Brixton.—The Effra-road congregation has lost a faithful member through the death of Mr. Alfred Barrett Midlane, on October 30, at the age of 71. Mr. Midlane belonged to an old Unitarian family in Newport, I.W., and when he came to London some fifty years ago he connected himself with Little Portland-street Chapel, where he was a valued helper in the Sunday-school. At Effra-road he was a member for many years, and served as warden for a considerable period. He was also a lay preacher on the plan of the Provincial Assembly.

Manchester: Renshaw-street Mission.—Evening service was conducted last Sunday, November 6, by Mr. R. D. Darbishire. Some of the elders, who remembered seeing Mr. Darbishire in the pulpit years ago, rejoiced to see him there once more; and the whole congregation gave him the respectful attention due to venerable age and practised wisdom. His visit was a manifestation of sympathy, which could not fail to be welcome and encouraging both to those who are carrying on the work of the Mission and to the people for whom they labour. It could be wished that other veterans of the good fight would come and do likewise.

Swinton.—A first meeting of the United Guilds connected with the chapels of Chowbent, Leigh, Astley, and Swinton, comprising the newly organised District Guild Union, was held on Saturday, October 29. Afternoon service was held in the chapel, conducted by the Rev. R. S. Redfern, of Leigh, the Rev. W. E. George, of Swinton, preaching the sermon. After tea, at which about 120 persons were present, a well-attended meeting was held, the Rev. J. J. Wright (president of the Union) in the chair. The visitors were welcomed by the Rev. W. E. George, and, in returning thanks, the president delivered a brief and helpful address. A paper was read by Mr. Richard Robinson, of Swinton, and subsequent speakers were Mr. Ridyard (Leigh), Revs. R. S. Redfern, W. E. George, P. Holt, and Mr. Lancaster (Bolton), who asked some questions as to the formation of a guild. The Rev. J. J. Wright replied, stating that he hoped to have the opportunity of visiting his Bolton friends, to assist in the formation of a guild. A highly successful gathering was concluded by a social evening.

Wakefield.—The annual school sermons were preached in Westgate Chapel on Sunday last in the morning by the minister, the Rev. Andrew Chalmers, and in the evening by the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, of Bradford. The attendance was large, the chapel at the second service being quite full, and the collection for the school fund highly satisfactory. At the annual congregational service on the following evening Mr. Jones was heartily thanked for his assistance, and he and the Rev. Edgar Lockett, of Pudsey, briefly addressed the large company that had assembled. Mr. Chalmers, who presided, said their history for the year had not been eventful, but was in all respects gratifying and encouraging. Both congregation and school had been earnest, harmonious, and prosperous, and the large band of young people were attached and loyal to the place and the cause. A pleasing feature of the proceedings was the presentation of a handsome solid silver rose-bowl to Mr. Dennis, to mark the completion of thirty years of valuable service as organist at Westgate Chapel. This was also given to him by the congregation and choir as a tribute of high esteem and affectionate regard, and the large sum raised had come without stint or pressure. A performance of vocal and instrumental music was rendered, and the usual vote of thanks brought the enjoyable occasion to a close.

Warwick.—The minister and congregation of High-street Chapel had the great pleasure of a visit from the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, on Sunday, October 30. His subjects were "Conversion" (morning), and "The Message of Unitarianism" (evening). In the unfoldment of these, the preacher penetrated to the heart of many questions and difficulties which stir men's minds at the present day, and the keen attention shown by the good congregations present at both services indicated that his words brought help and good cheer to a marked degree. The collections were for the B. and F. U. A., and amounted to £4 10s. 10d.

Yarmouth.—A special series of Sunday evening lectures is being delivered by the Rev. J. Birks, F.G.S., at the Old Meeting House, on "Religion in Poets." At the recent annual meeting of the Social Union, the secretary, Mr. J. Herbert, reported a successful season. The lectures, concerts, and social evenings had been well attended, with an average of fifty.

NEW UNITARIAN CHURCH, BIRKENHEAD.

IN Birkenhead for many years the dwelling portion of the town has been receding gradually from the neighbourhood of the Unitarian Church, and the consequent decrease in numbers made a change inevitable. From the amount realised by the sale of the old site, the sum of £5,000 was allotted for a new building, and a contract was made at this figure; but, owing chiefly to errors of judgment on the part of professional advisers, the final cost amounted to £7,000, exclusive of the land and of furnishing expenses.

The Congregation has done, and is doing, all that is possible in subscribing and raising money. In addition to subscriptions for the Church Building Fund, between £2,000 and £3,000 have been raised since 1897 for building Schools.

At the beginning of this year the total debt amounted to about £1,800, but this has now been reduced to about £1,100 by the subscriptions recorded below. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association warmly commend the endeavour to clear off the debt, and promise £100 as an expression of their interest, which they trust will be helpful. The Congregation appeal therefore for help to their fellow-worshippers in the Unitarian Body, so that unhampered by debt they may take advantage of the opportunity for increased activity, and spread in Birkenhead that faith which all Unitarians have at heart. Contributions will be gratefully acknowledged by

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE autumn meeting of the London District Unitarian Society on Wednesday evening, reported in another column, was delightful in its social aspect, and thoroughly vigorous and earnest in tone. The eloquent address of Dr. Burt Estes Howard we hope to publish in full next week. What we would specially emphasise here is the President's appeal for a completion of the fund of £7,500, of which £3,000 is now in hand, for the building of churches, which are sorely needed at Kilburn, Lewisham, and Plumstead. The congregations at these three places have amply vindicated their right to exist, and are deserving of the most generous support, to secure their position and give them the church buildings which are now essential to their progressive life.

PROFESSOR H. Y. GROENEWEGEN, of Leiden (whom many of our friends will remember as Treasurer at Amsterdam, in connection with the meeting of the International Council of Unitarians and other Liberal religious Thinkers and Workers) preached last Sunday at the Dutch Church, Austin Friars, E.C., and on the Friday and Tuesday evenings before and after, lectured on "Religion and Science" and "Religion and Art." On Monday evening the London Unitarian Ministers had the pleasure of welcoming Dr. Groenewegen at their monthly meeting.

WE referred last week to the formation of a Lay Preachers' Training Class for the benefit of the London Congregational churches. The Examiner, with a view of rendering the class as widely useful as possible, has commenced the weekly publication of Dr. Garvie's lecture notes. These will perhaps be of the greatest use to those who hear the lectures, but should have a value for a wider circle. "The preacher," says Dr. Garvie, "must so know his Bible as to find the Gospel in it, be so familiar with the thought of his age as to adapt his preaching to its needs and questions," and again "it would be well for lay preachers to be able to exhibit and emphasise the social aspects of the Christian Gospel." To this end teaching and training in matters of social present-day life is needed. But for the present Dr. Garvie confines himself to the first question—a Knowledge of the Bible—and, in this connection, he put in the forefront the need to understand and show an appreciation of recent thought on the Bible. The determination to get away from pre-Copernican views of the Bible is entirely in accordance with the mind of modern Congregationalism. The resolve is sometimes obscured: it is good to have it thus recognised by one of their leading scholars.

THE Royal Commission on the feeble-minded has commenced its public sittings for the hearing of evidence. The scope of the inquiry is indicated by the terms of the reference, which is as follows:—

To consider the existing method of dealing with idiots and epileptics, and with imbecile and feeble-minded, or defective persons not certified under the Lunacy Laws, and in view of the hardship or danger resulting to such persons and the community from insufficient provision for their care, training, and control, to report as to the amendments in the law or other measures which should be adopted in the matter, due regard being had to the expense involved in any such proposals, and to the best means of securing economy therein.

The explicit recognition of the insufficiency of provision which is here made, on the authority of the responsible Government of the country, is worthy of note, as also is the inclusion of the feeble-minded as a separate class. The claims of this large class of persons, who are not insane, but are equally certainly not capable of managing their own lives, have been rapidly coming to the front of late. We noticed a few months ago the proceedings of the Conference held at the Guildhall on this subject, and the strong action approved by those who are most closely in touch with the incompetents in our elementary schools. The "feeble-minded" were included as separate from the insane in the last census, and this classification was then adopted for the first time. It is, indeed, high time the question was taken in hand. We have even heard of philanthropists anxious to get people certified as insane who were clearly only feeble-minded, because then, and then only, could they be taken care of. The case of the epileptics, too, is one of terrible urgency. Miss Sutter's book called attention to the subject a few years ago. Much was written and said, and a small colony was formed. The experiment was enough to prove that private philanthropy could not deal with the evil. It is perfectly obvious that if it is ever to be treated as of national importance, it can only be done by State action. We trust that the proposals of this Commission will be as far-reaching as those of the Committee on Physical Deterioration, and that the action of the Commission will facilitate and not postpone the necessary legislative and administrative measures.

MUCH satisfaction has been expressed over the certainly not too early determination of one of the Methodist Churches in Georgia to discountenance the shameful practice of lynching. The Statesboro Methodist Church resolved that:—

We regard the act of anyone who participated in this deplorable act as being inimical to the best interest of our Church, and we recommend that such of our members who participated be hereby apprised of the displeasure of the Church, and be requested to withdraw without delay from our communion and membership unless a public confession of wrong be made with expression of penitence and contrition.

Such a definite denunciation should have long since been forthcoming from every Christian Church in the districts where these inhuman and lawless practices have prevailed. The immediate occasion of this protest was the burning alive of two negroes who had been already tried and sentenced to death, but were not allowed by the mob to have the benefit of even a legal and orderly execution.

THE November Mill Hill Pulpit consists of a sermon by the Rev. L. P. Jacks, of Manchester College, Oxford, on "The Good Fight." Another sermon by the same preacher is in this month's Seedsower. In Sermons for the Day the Rev. R. A. Armstrong published the address on "Jesus and Other Saviours of Men," given at the People's Service in the Liverpool Institute on Oct. 23.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

IRISH JUBILEE CELEBRATIONS.

THE fact that more than one-half of the Unitarian congregations in Ireland to-day are in charge of alumni of the Home Missionary College clearly marked out that country for an early visit in connection with the Jubilee celebrations; consequently after the meetings in Manchester and London a deputation crossed to Ireland. The deputation consisted of Principal Gordon and the Revs. Charles Peach and T. P. Spedding, Colonel Pilcher, who should have been with them, being detained at the last moment. In Ireland the deputation was joined by a large body of the alumni of the College, and by representatives of sister colleges who took part in one or more of the several meetings held. During their tour through the country the deputation had to fight against the adverse influence of the weather, but this, as one of them humorously remarked, they took "as one of the perquisites of their position, and they did not attribute it to the malign influence of friends who had disapproved their mission." Ireland claimed to have first sowed the seed of the Jubilee proposals; during the past week it has certainly watered them, and their fruition was now certain. The bad weather, however, impressed the effeminate visitors from England more than it did their Irish friends. These took up the meetings with unbounded enthusiasm, and from first to last carried them through in a manner which caused the visitors to wonder and rejoice. Indeed, the series of meetings was a revelation of the depth and intensity of the affection of the Irish congregations for the College and its work. Not only did men occupying the foremost places in the official and public life of Ireland take a leading part in the meetings, but the great body of our co-worshippers crowded the meetings, and everywhere received the visitors with enthusiasm, and loaded them with kindness and generous hospitality. The tour, which commenced at Dublin on Sunday, November 6, ended at Comber on the following Saturday, when, after an excellent meeting, a special train, kindly provided by the chairman of the County Down Railway, conveyed the deputation back to Belfast to catch the return boat to England.

The opening meeting at Dublin, excellent in the number present and its spirit, was rendered more important by the high character and great public positions of many of those who were present and took part. The chair was taken by the Right Hon. Mr. Justice Andrews, and after the objects of the meeting had been explained by Principal Gordon and the Rev. J. A. Kelly, a resolution of warm approval and commendation was passed unanimously on the motion of Dr. Falkiner and the Right Hon. Sir A. M. Porter, Bart., Master of the Rolls in Ireland. Among others taking part in the meeting were the Rev. G. Hamilton Vance, B.D., Professor McF. Orr, a former distinguished Wrangler, Lucius Hutton, Esq., and others. On Tuesday the deputation went on to Dromore. Tea having been served, the Rev. A. Davison took the chair and presided over a large audience which completely filled the fine lecture hall. The meeting was addressed by the members of the deputation amid a running chorus of applause and approval. A resolution of welcome with a pledge of support was carried unanimously at the instance of Mr. J. R. Minnis and Mr. W. Jardine Baxter. Then commenced an organised canvass of the meeting by the church officials. Over one hundred of those present promised subscriptions, many others intimated their intention of subscribing later; and with this remarkable expression of practical sympathy one of the best meetings within the experience of the deputation came to a close, and the English visitors were carried off to enjoy further hospitality in the homes of their kind hosts.

On the following evening, Wednesday, the deputation were in Belfast, where, in spite of wind and rain, a good meeting was assembled under the presidency of the Right Hon. Thomas Andrews, D.L. The chairman's speech struck a note ot deep conviction and strong sympathy, which roused the enthusiasm of the audience, while the deputation, inspired by their experience at Dromore, pleaded their cause well. The Revs. W. Napier, R. Lyttle, J. H. Bibby, J. A. Kelly, J. Worthington, A. Turner, and A. O. Ashworth, together with Messrs. Davidson, also addressed the meeting, at the close of which a number of substantial subscriptions were received.

Perhaps the finest meeting of all was the one held at Moneyrea on the Friday evening. Here, six miles from a town, and with hardly a house in sight, an audience of two hundred had assembled, men, women, and some children, most of whom had tramped or driven long miles through the rain. But when the meeting started everything else was forgotten. All the speakers were in good form, and with passages of moving eloquence and flashes of humour they alternately moved the audience to applause and laughter. No more ready or appreciative audience could have been desired by the speakers, nor a more evident sign of interest than the almost phenomenal outburst of local speaking after they had finished. Here was an English invasion they would welcome, they said, with open arms and hearts. They claimed the College as being theirs as well as England's, and they would support it as such. Kindly reminiscences of former Home Missionary College alumni who had ministered to them were recalled, and the enthusiasm culminated in repeated expressions of loyalty and affection to Mr. Lyttle, one of the most distinguished of recent Home Missionary College men, and for fifteen years their minister. The promises of practical support were general and generous, rising from the labourer's shilling, warmly tendered and thankfully received, to the farmer's ten pounds. That night the deputation thanked God that He had shown them the shining chambers of true, warm, human hearts.

Saturday's meeting at Comber partook more of the nature of the Belfast gathering. Touched with something of the reticence which comes of modern culture and town life, it was, perhaps, less demonstrative than the meetings held in country places. It was, however, a well-attended and important meeting, and of its earnestness and unanimity ample evidence was given in the speeches of local friends. The Right Hon. Thomas Andrews, D.L., presided, and in his address he said he could not conceive of a better way of celebrating the Jubilee than that proposed, an opinion taken up and endorsed by the Rev. T. Dunkerley, B.A., and Messrs. Simpson, James, and Alexander Orr, who followed after the deputaton with excellent speeches. Generous promises of support were again forthcoming, and the deputation departed trying to live up to the dignity of a special train.

As the steamer left the quay some people on the shore raised the old song "Come back to Erin." The hearts of the deputation responded warmly. Ireland had given them a welcome they would never forget; it had given an impetus to their cause, the influence of which would be felt throughout the Unitarian community.

CHARLES PEACH.

CEMETERY SERVICES.

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me to ask, through the medium of your paper a favour of my brother ministers? The civic authorities in various parts of the country allow ministers to organise themselves for the responsibility of attending daily to conduct the Burial Service as may be required in the Nonconformist parts of the public cemeteries. I am anxious to know how this works out in different places. How far are Unitarian ministers permitted to take their place in rotation with other Nonconformist ministers? In cases where that privilege is delegated to the Free Churches Federation are ministers of churches and chapels known by the public as Unitarian recognised? I happen to know they are in certain instances, but I should be glad to be further informed as to how far the custom is general. Those who will kindly write to me without delay will confer a favour upon me.

TEMPERANCE SUNDAY, NOV. 27.

SIR,—The last Sunday in November (the 27th) having been fixed as Temperance Sunday, it is hoped that, in common with other denominations, arrangements may be made for sermons dealing with temperance reform to be delivered in all Unitarian and Free Christian Churches, and for addresses to be given in the Sunday-schools, and that the proceeds of collections may be devoted to local temperance work or forwarded to the treasurer of the National Unitarian Temperance Association.

The most recent and valuable pronouncement on the temperance question has been the Lees-Raper lecture recently delivered by Mr. John Burns, M.P., and I shall be pleased to forward a copy of this lecture to any minister or Sunday-school superintendent who may favour me with his name and address.

J. BREDALL.

Mr. W. R. Marshall, of 185, Torridon-road, Catford, S.E., Organising Secretary of the National Unitarian Temperance Association, also writes on this subject:—

"I am glad to inform you that on Temperance Sunday no less than thirty-five special sermons and addresses to Sunday-schools will be given by the ministers in our churches on the various aspects of the Temperance problem. At three of these special services collections will be taken on behalf of the Association.

"My returns are by no means complete, and many others will doubtless send along a postcard stating their intentions. As our ministers are invariably busy men, it would be well, perhaps, if some interested member of each congregation would write to me as to the nature of the address delivered. By such means a full report of Temperance Sunday could be made.

"In one London chapel last year on a similar occasion a slip of paper with pencil attached was hung in each pew, and the congregation was invited to join the Association. Will temperance enthusiasts take the hint?

EAST CHESHIRE CHRISTIAN UNION BAZAAR.

MAY I ask the kind attention of your readers to the advertisement of the catering committee, which appears in your columns. The arrangements will be much the same as in our Manchester District bazaar of 1897, and we would beg all our friends who are in Manchester while the bazaar is open to avail themselves of the facilities for lunch, tea, and supper which this committee now appeal for help in providing. The one thing needed is that the Manchester churches should give to East Cheshire now the same generous aid that the latter gave to Manchester in 1897. May I, as a "Manchester District" member, earnestly beg for it?

GEO. W. RAYNER WOOD,
President and Treasurer.

Singleton, Manchester,

AT the present time, when the question of credal subscriptions is so prominent, special interest attaches to a point in the report of a recent ordination of a Congregational minister, that the "usual questions" were asked and answered. The ordination includes no subscription, but it used to be the custom for the minister in reply to certain leading questions to set forth his views of the Christian ministry and the Christian faith. We say used to be because a considerable number, an ever increasing number, of the ministers never are ordained in the old familiar sense of the term. Many of the present ministers do not even know what the "usual questions" are, so unusual are they at present. The belief that a living faith is too large a thing to be compressed in any formal answer to a formal question is gaining ground. Here is an instance of growing freedom, an indication of how very flexible the Congregational polity is, containing as it does an indefinite power of development in answer to larger knowledge, and in response to the changing needs of each fresh generation of worshippers.

THE REV. CHARLES HARGROVE'S MISSION TO AUSTRALASIA.

LETTERS EN ROUTE.

XII.

Wellington, October 4, 1904.

NEW ZEALAND strikes a visitor from the old world as new indeed. I have long ago got used to understand that when a house is said to be "very old" it is meant at the most that it is nearly as old as I am myself—not quite, for when I was born there were no buildings at Auckland and Wellington but the wooden shanties on the shore, which have long since given place to fine and substantial warehouses and offices, while Dunedin and Christchurch were as yet not thought of. But it is not only the constructions of our race which are so recent, the very land itself is new as compared with the countries we have been before familiar with. I am no geologist, but I must be blind not to see the glacier's course marked by terminal and lateral moraines, as if it had retreated but a few years ago from the valleys now filled with deep lakes and bordered by sheep pastures. The signs of volcanic action are written large on promontory and sound, and the hot springs and geysers show how the force is not yet spent, and warn too-confident dwellers in yet unfinished territory that the eruption of 1889, which destroyed the famous pink terraces, will not be the last of its kind. Then the marks of elevation and subsidence of the coast are to be noted even in the streets, and it is not half a century ago that a benevolent earthquake enlarged the too-restricted area for the expansion of Wellington, and turned what had been and is still by name its quay into a road a hundred yards back from the beach, from which it is now blocked out by numerous business premises; at the same time, it converted the pool reserved for a dock into dry ground, still known as the Basin, but used for cricket. The very coal we are burning tells the same story of newness, for it is a true lignite, and needs hundred thousand years more to turn it into genuine coal.

Wellington has chosen for its motto "Suprema a situ," referring to the choice of it, though inferior in population to the three other cities of New Zealand, for the seat of government. It has been made "supreme because of its situation," as nearly central as could be found. But to me it seems that a proud citizen might well attach a nobler claim to the words, and make it his boast that Wellington was supreme among the cities of the colony, second only to Sydney among those of the Southern Hemisphere by reason of its magnificent position on the ocean and in the midst of the mountains, sheltered from storms and enjoying a sea tamed to be her servant. Indeed, its port has a commerce larger than that of Bristol, and room to shelter the navy of the whole kingdom.

I climbed to-day the western hills which bound the city. For two hours I walked along the high ridge overlooking crowded streets and busy quays below without meeting a fellow creature. Beneath my feet was grass grown from English seed; above my head sang the lark descended from English parents. Cows and horses of the old country stock grazed around. Homes of the moderately rich and the comfortably poor were visible on every hill slope far and near. The view was wide, but of the primæval bush which only half a century ago clothed it all from shore to hill-top there was nothing left save here and there a scanty remnant, thinned for firewood and invaded by sturdier trees from northern lands.

It was easy to reconstruct the scene as Captain Cook, first of white men, beheld it in 1770, the same as it appeared to the first settlers in 1840. For the main features are, of course, unchanged, and except for the destruction of the bush by fire and axe so converting the hill-slopes to fertile pastures, it is little that civilised men have done or could do to make or mar the prospect. To the south the Pacific becomes visible, on the left stretching uninterrupted to the Antarctic Circle, on the right bounded by the mountains of the Middle Island. A narrow channel connects the ocean with the great inland harbour, a basin among the hills some six miles in length by four in depth, at this end so deep that large vessels moor to the wharf close to the warehouses; away to the north, silted up by the mud brought down from the high and now snow-clad hills of the interior, which has formed a fertile plain. Here and there along the shore in old time the Maoris had made a clearing and built a "pa," or stockaded village. Two stood where Wellington is now built, and the old names have been kept in the city nomenclature. But the land was then covered with forest impenetrable except for the narrow paths cut by the natives, like Britain as Julius Cæsar found it two thousand years ago, and its tattooed warriors and priests in just the same early stage of civilisation.

And my life-time—and I am not yet a Methuselah—has effected here all the change between modern England and ancient Britain, so that to-day New Zealand is in no respect behind the foremost of mankind in the arts of civilised life, and in some respects ahead of all the world.

As for religion, there is the fullest liberty, nor have I discovered any sign of the bigotry or exclusiveness which is so common at home. There is no Established Church, possessed, as at home, of ancient endowments and privileges, and maintaining its exclusive right to the magnificent edifices which are a nation's pride. All are on a level as respects religion, brought up in the same unsectarian schools, and unused to the distinction of "church" and "chapel," "clergyman" and "minister," which help to perpetuate religious dissension in England.

As your readers know, there is only one Unitarian congregation in New Zealand, and that, though flourishing and soon to be independent, of quite recent growth. But assuredly there are numerous Unitarians, and the difficulty is to get them to know themselves and come together and recognise the benefit of united worship.

At Christchurch I could do nothing. It is the Athens of Australasia, and its people are ever ready to "hear some new thing." I believe I should have fared better if only the faith I preached had not been so old; if I had come with some new revelation or new interpretation of old Scriptures. But Unitarianism is not without its witnesses even there, and it is of small consequence that they "follow not with us." I had good audiences at the two lectures I gave, although the weather was very unfavourable; and there, as everywhere, I have been met with the friendliest reception.

Here the case is very different. The Richmonds and the Atkinsons, families had in honour for their virtues and their talents and the high places which their members have held in the government of the colony, came here in the early days with Unitarian associations and memories which they have never let go. I am told that Judge Richmond, a lawyer who was known and esteemed in England as well as here, conducted services regularly in his own house, but would not admit others than members of the family, as he shrank from seeming to put himself forward as a minister. Besides these there are others who have brought the name with the faith from the old home, and have brought up their children in it. They have had no choice but either to join in religious worship more or less repellent to their sentiments, as most of them have done hitherto, or to give up public worship altogether. Now, for the first time, Unitarian services have been offered to them, and they have availed themselves of the offer in a way which shows that a regular ministry, if such could be provided, would here be useful and acceptable. On Sunday last, the third which I spent in Wellington, I had about 40 at morning service, of whom 26 were men, and about 60 in the evening, which was wet. There is a ready-made choir and more than one efficient pianist. Last night we had a meeting of sympathisers and supporters, and passed a resolution to form a Unitarian Society, to which over fifty have since given in their names. It was also arranged to make a beginning by holding a public service on the first evening of each month. Altogether, the prospects are decidedly hopeful. The greatest difficulty will be to find the right man.

CHARLES HARGROVE.

THE way in which the Wesleyan Methodists, in their Central Hall lectures, are dealing with some of the practical questions, suggested by every attempt to give effect in real life to the teaching of Christ, deserves admiration and imitation. The Rev. S. Keeble has spoken in no uncertain tone of Christianity and War. "Men may spin sophistries, or weave clever casuistries in defence of war, they may defend it upon the ground of present necessity, policy, or expediency, but they can never harmonise it with Christianity." Such is the centre of Mr. Keeble's contention; and he has "illustrated it and proved it by Scripture and by reason," as John Wesley might say. It is a timely protest well delivered.

NOT quite so satisfactory is Mr. T. C. Horsfall's lecture on "What Christ tells us to do," &c. If one reduces the teaching of Christ to the expression, Do as you would be done by, the Christian ethic is thereby somewhat narrowed, and is liable to be still further straitened by an unimaginative application of the accepted rule. But nothing but good will come of facing such problems boldly in the face of open day.

HAWTHORNE'S PURITANISM.

HAWTHORNE and Emerson should be read to supplement each other. Though they lived for a time in the same village of Concord, and were friends, they had little influence upon each other. Each went his own way, Hawthorne rooted in the past, Emerson declaring that now is the time of inspiration, life, knowledge, God—disdaining the past in comparison with the present, and using it only to illustrate some modern theme. Emerson threw over Puritan theology, and, though he could not have been what he was but for Puritan influences behind him, emancipated himself from the gloomy forebodings and terrible moral problems which beset the Pilgrim Fathers and their descendants, into a cheery optimism and smiling belief that God is good, man is divine, the world is God's revelation, man more so, and all is well.

But the Puritan problems were real problems, and if the terrible answers they gave were such as to make a tragedy of life, they held fast to the righteousness of God, and their very harshness and cruelty were the outcome of a belief in the reality of eternal life, the horror of sin, and the obligation to do God's will. Their crude theology of original sin and the banishment of man for the disobedience of Adam and Eve, and of his restitution on condition of accepting the substitutionary sacrifice of Christ, might be brushed aside by scientific, historic, and literary criticism, but the problems thus expressed in hard and fallacious terms remained. And even the geniality of Emerson does not annul them, though every benign lover of light and humanity does something to lift the world out of the struggle which is still a reality to most people.

God's kingdom in heaven and the kingdom of God upon earth were the Puritan's aspiration, and with it went the determination to dragoon all who could be forced into the kingdom, to punish and mark with shame all who did wrong, to destroy their bodily life rather than let them perish for ever; or, if their eternal damnation could not be prevented, to make them a warning to others. The Puritans believed in the strict line of demarcation between saved and unsaved. In their earthly cities they tried to separate the sinner from the virtuous by most decisive and conspicuous methods. The terrible difference which they perceived between good and evil they mistakenly supposed to be a great gulf between good and evil persons, and marked their hatred of sin by separating themselves from those they stigmatised as sinners and harshly punishing them.

Their policy and government in New England settlements produced both cruelty and hypocrisy. But it is a mistake to consider these as the essentials of Puritanism. Hawthorne does not do so, but by his stories, more effectively and accurately than would be possible in any argued treatise, symbolises and expresses the inwardness of Puritanism, not the travesty of it as if it were all self-deceit, self-righteousness, and persecution of the weak. These results are suggested, but Hawthorne knew Puritanism in his studies and in himself far too well to mistake its extravagances for itself, or its pretended adherents for its true representatives.

In that long, brooding, meditative seclusion at the beginning of his manhood he was working into the heart of the Puritan problems. Among the books to which he was specially attracted were the "Newgate Calendar" and the "Pilgrim's Progress." The crimes and sins of men must be accounted for, a true explanation sought of man's pilgrimage through life, not omitting the difficult facts. Some might think that the companionship of Emerson's cheery optimism would have been an advantage to him; but it would not if it had drawn him off from thorough investigation, into a region that for him would have had no substantial foundation. The time came, however, when the tender, loving faith of Sophia Peabody gave him what no man could have given, and, no doubt, his period of brooding had been long enough.

In the history of his own family and in the Puritan annals which suggested many of his stories he had learned what was one of the great faults of Puritanism — the compulsory application to others of the dictates of our own conscience; the persecution of others for their sin and unbelief, which were supposed to be the same thing. He therefore dealt not chiefly with the outward drama of life, but the inward drama of the soul, the development of conscience, the nature of sin, its penalties resulting from the inevitable action of spiritual laws, apart from any question of legality and official condemnation, the transmission of its evil results to descendants, the possibility of annulling these results by love and the beneficence of the pure in heart. These are the old Puritan problems, to explain which the doctrines of the Fall, Hell, Original Sin, and Vicarious Sacrifice were held sufficient. They were inadequate, formal, harsh, and forgetful of the love of God. Hawthorne did not hold them; but he did not throw over with them the truths they emphasised and sometimes disfigured.

The "Scarlet Letter" was the first of Hawthorne's longer stories. It brought him some popularity, and has since been republished in England more frequently than his other works. He did not count it his best book, and it is not. But it plunged into the depths of consciousness, showing the effects of the same deed in the human soul of the woman who has been stigmatised and reprobated for it, and in the man, who, there being no manifest result of his deed, retained all outward respect. They are neither of them utterly wicked: the Puritan classification is faulty, melodramatic. The scrutinising, insidious espionage of the guilty by the man who has in outward act and judgment suffered the wrong, prove him at heart, in his devotion to revenge, the falling man, even while the "sinners" are rising from their sin. The dramatic climax of the story is the public acknowledgment of guilt by the reputed saint after long working of conscience and remorse, and his escape thereby from his tormentor.

It is a pity that Hawthorne should be judged mainly by this story, powerful as it is. "The House of the Seven Gables" is in many ways more satisfactory, and there is sunny truth in it, while still the problem is that of sin, sin in its effects from generation to generation, hereditary evil. Hawthorne has the predisposition of the Puritan to look at the moral problems as that of Sin and how to flee from it, rather than of Love and how to live in it; but he shows in this story Love as the dissolver of hereditary evil. It is a new reading of the problem of original sin.

The most powerful grasp of the problem of moral development, and the most daring suggestion for a restatement of the doctrine of the "Fall" of man is in his last completed story, "The Marble Fawn" ("Transformation"), whose scenery is Italian, but whose theme is again Puritan. The joyful, childishly simple, fawn-like Donatello in his Garden-of-Eden innocence has none of the gloom and remorse and seriousness of the modern man: he has an almost animal vivacity and freedom from care. But through human love he is impelled to the committal of a crime without clear consciousness that it is a crime. This act brings him definitely to the knowledge of good and evil, remorse, gloom, sorrow; conscience develops, and (though the outward action is utterly subservient and almost unnecessary to the spiritual development of the story), causes him to give himself up to the formal administrators of justice. The drama is inward, as in Hawthorne's other stories, and the reader goes astray who is very curious about the outward events.

In front of Raphael's "Last Judgment" Hawthorne meditated: "At the last day—I presume, that is, in all future days, when we shall see ourselves as we are—man's only inexorable judge will be himself, and the punishment of his sins will be the perception of them." This passage is the keynote of much that Hawthorne produced, especially "The Scarlet Letter" and "The Marble Fawn." Hilda is the representative in the "Marble Fawn" of the Puritan purity of character, feeling that any friendly association with sin or sinners is a defilement, and evidently Hawthorne felt it was a noble type he represented; but, though the suggestion is abhorrent to her and her type, he yet has to give expression to the idea: "Is sin, like sorrow, merely an element of human education through which we struggle to a higher and purer state than we could otherwise have attained?" This he represents as being so in the development of Donatello, who grew in intelligence, perception, depth of affection, all that is comprehended in the word humanity, as a result of his entrance on the conflict of good and evil, striving for the light through the darkness.

In the charmingly written modern versions of old-world stories of "The Wonder Book," in the children's stories from American history, as well as in nearly all the short original stories, the spiritual Puritanism of Hawthorne is manifested, leaving behind the letter that kills (and which made the Puritan kill also). In the "Blithedale Romance" he gets further away from his usual theme. We are interested in Zenobia as a woman rather than a symbol, and she does some little havoc with Puritan principles, and carries the author with her. But Priscilla and Coverdale do something to remind us by contrast that Zenobia is an exotic flower like that which she wore in her bosom. And the atmosphere of Brook Farm was that of the Transcendentalists more than any other which Hawthorne ever breathed.

When we remember that "The House of the Seven Gables" was written some years before the publication of Darwin's "Origin of Species," and "The Marble Fawn" too early to be influenced by that publication and its effects, the line of thought in these stories is the more remarkable, approached and expressed not in the scientific manner of that age, but in the way of analysis of human consciousness—heredity instead of original sin, mesmerism as an explanation of witchcraft, the rise of man through conflict with evil, instead of the fall of man through the knowledge thereof.

One other Puritan prepossession should be noted, although I cannot state with certainty what were its implications in Hawthorne's own mind. He expressed the belief that man's efforts were quite unable to alter the divine purpose, that what God predestines will come to pass. This might readily be taken as a fatalistic doctrine, but it is more definitely stated in his earlier than in his later romances: and is essentially, I believe, the confidence that however evil may prosper on a limited view, good will at last triumph, and that

> There's a divinity that shapes our ends,
> Rough-hew them as we will.

The sincerity of Hawthorne's conviction that the sin of one is a burden on the character of all, and that all are in a measure responsible for every evil that is in humanity, is shown in his chapter on "Outside Glimpses of English Poverty" in "Our Old Home," together with the corresponding passages in the "Note-books." These are of great significance in themselves, and for the understanding of their author, but would require separate treatment, not a paragraph merely, at the end of an article.

PRIESTLEY PRIME.

RELIGION IN DAILY LIFE.

My father, if the prophet had bid thee do some great thing, wouldst thou not have done it?"—NAAMAN'S SERVANT.

NOTHING is more wonderful in the Old Testament Scriptures than the genius which enables so many of the writers to give us, in the few verses of a simple story, a rounded view of the characters of whom they tell. Each personage is human to the heart's core. We know it because the same kind of people are with us to this day.

The kindred of Naaman, for instance, live in every house in every street. These are the people who understand and believe in the influence of big things and overlook or despise the influence of the littles. They would "do some great thing" gladly to work out their own or the world's salvation, but have not yet grasped the truth that the kingdom of heaven cometh not with observation. Such people feel at times a passionate enthusiasm for foreign mission service, because of the wrench involved in leaving home and country, the privations and loneliness of the work, and its dramatic success when it is successful. Oh, if only that had been their vocation! Meanwhile at home, they are lazy or cross or procrastinating or selfish; and many young folks, watching their lives, are repelled from religion and learn to fear enthusiasm. What a pity that such people do not see that the "great thing" which is to glorify life is the battle with sin in their own hearts, that in their own souls is the heathendom they are to bring into the obedience of Christ!

Young ministers are given to preach much about dying—as if that were the greatest or most terrible thing we had to do. But nearly everybody who has lived to middle age realises that there are many things far worse to bear than death. Many and many a one, oppressed by a sense of blighting weakness, by a seemingly futile struggle against sin in one's self or in the world, has felt how easy it would be to die, if by dying one could conquer sin or save the world. The really difficult and heroic thing is to live—to live through discouragement, working on in sure and certain hope of the dawn of a brighter day in which the Good shall triumph.

We catch ourselves feeling sometimes that we could acquit ourselves nobly in "one crowded hour of glorious life," if that were given to us and that were all. We think we could prepare our spirits for tragedy if we were forewarned, we could act supremely through any crisis if we only knew it for what it was. What we so seldom realise is this—that life is a matter not of years, nor months, nor days, but of hours and of minutes; and the crises of our lives come to us with the slow, even pace of the ticking of the clock, no man knowing which beat may usher in the hour that fixes his destiny. This only do we know—that our use of every interval between the clock-beats goes to determine the quality of our action in the decisive moment of our lives. In spite of the proverb, "coming events" very rarely "cast their shadows before" in any fashion which we can detect, and Tragedy often calls for the exercise of the highest and best in our nature without an instant for preparation.

Even from the most gifted and those who are to do the noblest things Life seldom asks one great unexpected achievement. So far from that, we have Michael Angelo's dictum that "Genius is eternal patience." The glories of sculpture, of painting, of poetry, of statesmanship, were wrought out by men and women who had as their best endowment "an infinite capacity for taking pains." They did great things, it is true. But every great thing was the outcome of a lifetime of little things, each of which in its turn had been well and truly done. The most splendid natural abilities had otherwise been wasted. A man may have within himself the power to make marble seem to breathe, but if he will not patiently study every bone and muscle of the living form, and still more patiently year by year apply that knowledge in directing every chisel-blow, he will produce only a marble fiasco—a laughing-stock.

If the prophet had asked thee to do some great thing?—We have been asked to do it, every one of us. We have been asked by God, for His sake and for the sake of others, to live a noble human life—pure in thought and word and deed, honest, kindly, helpful, generous, a life inspired by God every day and all day long, one which shall be rich in blessed influences upon all who shall come in contact with us, and which, at last, shall be ended worthily on this side of the veil and pass into higher opportunities of service in the unseen. That is a brief, inadequate presentment of our task. It doesn't matter a scrap, so far as the perfection of our life is concerned, what the subsidiary forms of our work may be—whether foreign missions or landscape gardening, or hawking shoelaces and thimbles, or leading the House of Commons, or darning stockings—it doesn't matter one jot or tittle. What matters beyond all idea of comparison is, How and in what spirit are we doing this "great thing"?

It was the fact that Naaman's self-love was wounded which called forth the question from his servant. He is represented as turning in a huff from the prophet's door, unwilling to use the simple remedy prescribed for him because it was so simple; willing, in his vanity, to return a leper as he came. It is a form of vanity in us which leads us to wish for to feel our lot to be obscure and not worthy of the very best that is in us, body, mind, and soul. But, if we could only see it so, what does it matter whether it is our name or another's that is associated with any given work done for humanity, so long as the work is done? We help all good work and right endeavour if we day by day do our best in the lowly sphere of our own lives, and we are saved from the responsibilities and the testing of spirit which come to those who are much in the public eye. History is constantly proving to us that it is the spirit within the man or woman which counts, and not the position filled or the kind of talent entrusted to us. That it is extremely difficult to be a ruler and beneficent is witnessed by the appalling number of failures among sovereigns. On the other hand, every truly great man points with gratitude to some obscure individual, and says of him or her, Such-an-one made me what I am. The "good" Earl of Shaftesbury used to say that it was to his nurse he owed the philanthropic impulse which led him to devote his life to ragged humanity. One wonders whether she ever longed for "a wider sphere of usefulness." I think not. Her power to influence her nursling could only have been won by cheerful selfless devotion to the work God had given her to do.

. . . some great thing to do

There is an old story of a cathedral which was being built long ago, over the portal of which the name of the Emperor who dedicated it was to be inscribed. But when the great building was finished it was found that not the Emperor's, but a woman's name was on the lintel. The name was cut out, only to reappear next morning. Once more it was erased, and again it was restored. Then proclamation was made for the owner of the name, and she was dragged before the Emperor. She proved to be a poor widow, whose only share in raising the magnificent church had been that, out of the depth of her love and pity, she had given the straw from her mattress to make the rough stone road a little easier for the oxen which drew the heavy loads of stone up the steep hill on which the building stood. She gave with no thought of self. The Emperor gave to immortalise himself. So, only "when the books are opened" shall we know how the account really stands for us and for all men, and many of the entries will that day surprise us all. The "great things" of human history will then be found to have been done by quiet, everyday workers who in their own souls held fast an unconquerable faith, an undying hope, an utterly selfless love.

MARY RALPH.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

IN this month's Independent Review Mr. G. Lowes Dickinson, author of an essay on "The Meaning of Good," and the "Letters of John Chinaman," has an article on "Faith and Knowledge," following up the argument of two previous articles on "Religion and Revelation" to which we called attention at the time of their appearance. The faith, which is not knowledge, in the sense that it can be scientifically demonstrated, Mr. Dickinson regards as "the sense and the call of the open horizon," the conviction that truth is to be found, and life on the whole is good and worth while. It is the impulse to grow and expand; it is "a tongue of the central fire that burns at the heart of the world." It is, we should say, something more, and something more definite than this, a conviction which lays hold of some of the elementary facts of human experience, which "look to heaven, and intend eternity." Another interesting article in this number is Mr. F. M. Stawell's on "Helenism and Christianity." Mr. T. W. Hirst writes of "Internationalism and The Hague."

In the Contemporary, which opens with a tribute to Sir William Harcourt by Mr. Herbert Paul, we would call special attention to the article on "The Unemployed: Lessons of the Mansion House Fund," which shows how much there is to be done by means of Labour Colonies, and how serious the need of discrimination between those who will not, those who cannot, and those who can and will work. Mr. Stephen Coleridge's article on "A Great Breach of Trust," with reference to the moneys contributed to King Edward's Hospital Fund, should also be noted. The article on "The Religion of the Respectable Poor" should be read by all city workers, and by any who are apt to think lightly of the neglected poor. "Then you have only worked among the respectable poor?" asked one of District Nurse. "I have only worked among the poor whom I respected," was the reply.

In the Nineteenth Century and After shocked orthodoxy in the Church of England replies to Mr. Mallock in two articles, one by Prebendary Whitworth on "Free Thought in the Church of England," the other by "A Capable Clergyman" in his diocese, as the Bishop of Worcester says, in a commendatory note to the Editor, defending his bishop from what he takes to be gross misrepresentations.

The Monthly Review has a very unsympathetic article on the "Salvation Army," by Mr. John Manson, with figures and diagrams showing how little is done of real religious work as compared with the enormous income elaborately raised. Mr. Norman Pearson's article on "Evil" argues that the true thought of God in relation to this Universe is of one so conditioned that He must not be spoken of as omnipotent, and concludes:

> The mystery of evil owes its mysteriousness chiefly to the incongruous attributes with which earlier thought invested its author. Clear away these disfigurements, and the moral reproach of the mystery will disappear with them, and evil, freed from all that is malignant, may then find place in the Divine scheme as a stern but faithful minister of its benign purpose.

BY THE FIRESIDE.

THIS is an English edition published by Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton (from the American plates, evidently) of one of Pasteur Charles Wagner's books, to which reference was made in a notice in these columns August 6. As that notice gave no sample of the author's style, a few may be given here as a sufficient indication of the character of the book. The present volume is neat and attractive in form, and instead of costing five shillings, as in the American issue, it is published at three-and-sixpence. Referring the reader to the previous notice for some account of the genial and clear-minded author, whose works ought to become popular in this country, we subjoin these paragraphs, culled almost at random here and there from his pages.

W. G. T.

Good Humour.

"You dust your furniture and burnish your silver; believe me, it is as necessary to keep watch over your temper, to freshen it and brighten it. We are threatened without ceasing by a subtle evil like those that attack the leaves of the vine and wither and corrode them. Beware of bad temper, that mildew of the soul; its nature is contagious. From parents it spreads to children and to all the household, and I even know a parrot to contract the malady. It had a fund of amusing sayings, but at the end of two years in an ill-tempered family it had forgotten them all, and incessantly repeated, "'I'm in a perfect rage!'"

Servants.

"There is a blot on the life of every man who reduces another man to slavery, for tyranny brings forth manners that double-dye the tyrant. Let us preserve ourselves and our children from the ineradicable blight that settles upon regions where the human soul is affronted in the person of the lowly. To make of our children useful men, let us raise them in reverence for man, whatever costume he may wear or whatever station he may occupy. Better welcome a thunderbolt to the roof than lodge a pariah under it."

Animal Friends.

"Some of our kind give their attention to enumerating the characteristics which distinguish them from the brutes, summing up their superiorities, their titles of nobility, in short, glorifying themselves at the expense of all creation that has not the distinction—to use a famous formula—of being a featherless biped. . . . Man flatters himself that he is greater than the other beings peopling the world about him, as if in any other creature there were other merit than that of its Creator, or as if another than He could measure any creature's worth or know its beginning or its end! The true quest for each of us, it seems to me, is the seeking out of God's design for him. I should not mind being an ant, provided I were an ant after God's own heart.''

Golden Hair and Grey.

''Grandparents are oftentimes infirm, and in need of service; to help them is a very good thing for the child, little lover of noise and mischief that he is. To lend young eyes to grandpa to see the time, to read fine print, the better to find the way; to thread a needle for grandmamma, who even with glasses cannot do it; to run to save their old limbs fatigue, to make a little less noise in the house so as not to disturb their sleep—all this is unqualified blessing to the young apprentices of life, and it is kindness to them to make believe that they are needed. 'Grandpa, how could you have got up the steps if you hadn't had hold of my hand?' 'I've no idea, dearie; it's well you were along to help me.' After such a reply the child feels himself a little man, and is proud and happy to have been of use. Let these little ones serve us, do us kindnesses, and pet us. Let us accept their presents and see that nothing they have themselves made for us is ever left about uncared for and forgotten. Let them celebrate our birthday with reminders of the years we would so willingly forget, and of the love it is so good to know is ours. In short, let us respect and maintain the alliance that the Master of our days has established between the golden heads and the grey. Through it life gains in colour, in warmth, most of all in unity, and it is given us to see more clearly along our obscure way when we feel that the same watch is kept by the morning and the evening star.''

OBITUARY.

MR. THOMAS GLADSTONE.

As briefly recorded in our columns last week, Mr. Gladstone died on the 9th inst. at King's Grange, near Castle Douglas, his native place, at the age of eighty-four. For nearly thirty years past he had been in the habit of spending four months of the year at King's Grange, situated in the midst of a beautiful country in the lowlands of Scotland, and it was here that he spent the last few months of his life.

Mr. Gladstone came to Birmingham in 1844 at the age of twenty-four, and laid the foundations of the business of Mackie and Gladstone, which afterwards became so successful.

Shortly after coming to live in Birmingham, he became a member of the New Meeting Congregation in Moor-street. He had not been brought up in the Unitarian faith, but was, we understand, converted to it through the preaching of the Rev. George Harris. He became a member of the congregational Committee of the New Meeting which was formed in 1858 to consider the question of the removal of the congregation to a more convenient locality, and which resulted in the building of the Church of the Messiah, to which they removed at the end of 1861. He was appointed a trustee of that church in 1867, and also held the office of warden. He took a great interest in the Ministers' Benevolent Society, and subscribed to its funds from its foundation in 1852 to the time of his death. He was on the board of directors from 1861 to 1864, and discharged the duties of auditor from 1870 to 1876. He was a Trustees of the Oldbury Charity from 1864 down to the time of his death. In connection with all these institutions his advice and judgment were highly valued.

Mr. Gladstone was a regular attendant at the services of the Church of the Messiah till the last few years of his life, when he became too deaf to hear the minister. He was one of the most generous subscribers to the church funds, and also to those of the Domestic Mission, Fazeley-street, in which he took a warm interest for more than forty years.

In politics he was an ardent Liberal, and remained so to the end. Though he took no active part in the public affairs of the town, he was always keenly interested in everything affecting its welfare.

Mr. Gladstone leaves a widow and nine children to mourn his loss. He was buried on Saturday last in the little country churchyard of the parish of Urr, about three miles from his house.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

LAMPS.—II.

THE youngest of my readers even now is as a lamp. It is your business to throw light upon the path of life. You are not to be sulky and gloomy and full of grumbling in the home; but you are to make it full of light and happiness by your love, your affectionate thoughtfulness, and by your joyous singing and merry laughter.

Sulky, bad-tempered children are like those black, heavy clouds that darken the sky just before a thunderstorm. True, we get lightning, but what we want is clear, steady shining. There should be no more uncertainty about our constant shining than there is about the sun or the moon. Of course clouds will pass over us now and again and hide our light for a time, but we should go on shining nevertheless.

I could give you all sorts of illustrations. Some of us are like old-fashioned rushlights: we give all the light we can, but it is not much. Others are like those magnificently huge wax candles I have seen at Roman Catholic shrines. Even when they are lit they have very little illuminating power, but they look very fine and ceremonious. What a grand blaze they could make if only they were right at heart—had a larger wick! Some are like a lamp badly trimmed, when the flame runs up one side and cracks the glass. Slovenly habits always end in waste and trouble. If we want to see clearly we should not despise small preparations; our thoughts should be concentrated and our patience exercised.

It is remarkable how fond children are of anything that emits light; yet when it proceeds from fire it should be carefully dealt with. When I was a boy we used to make turnip lanterns for the impressive celebration of Gunpowder Plot. We did not have so many squibs and fireworks as you have nowadays. We used to get big turnips and hollow them out and cut all sorts of patterns in the sides, so that the burning candle which we placed inside could shoot its light through. Some people are like these turnip lanterns: they are only fit for carnival, and they soon dwindle up into mere rubbish. Others, again, are regular bull's-eyes: their powerful lenses catch up all the light and focus it quite brilliantly. That's what we all ought to do. Bull's-eyes are splendid things for lighting up dark corners, as the policeman well knows; and each one of us cannot learn too early the value of economising and concentrating all the power that is in him.

Then, too, railway lamps remind me forcibly of different men and women I meet. There are glaring red lamps which indicate danger; green lamps which tell us to slacken speed; and white lamps which say that all is clear ahead, and that we can press forward. Beware how you distinguish between these illuminants! I have already mentioned beacon-lights; they have been known to be put to a destructive use. In olden times men called wreckers used on stormy nights to burn their beacon-lights in certain positions in order to induce sailors to so change the course of their ships as to run upon the rocks. Then those wreckers, heedless of the cries of drowning men, would steal the cargo and live upon the spoil. To-day there are men who, figuratively and morally, are every bit as bad as wreckers. They are capable of emitting much light; but they are actuated by selfishness, and in satisfying their own greedy desires they care not whose destruction is involved; indeed, they wilfully allure unwary navigators on to the rocks and shoals.

Be careful not to walk in darkness. Ponder the path of your feet, and throw your light around in order that you may progress safely. Most of you have either read or seen acted in pantomime the story of Aladdin and his wonderful lamp. There were rich treasures to be found if only they were carefully sought after; but the possession of a certain old lamp was necessary ere proper search could be made; without it effort was futile. This story is told every day, although in different words. Great treasures are still to be found, and many of the new lamps offered for sale are spurious and inadequate. The treasures of knowledge, righteousness of life, and manliness are eminently to be desired; they are beyond all price, and our object in this life should be to find them. Playing knits our limbs, and education sharpens our wits; but something more is requisite. The miner who would bring up the earth's treasure must be provided with a lamp as well as with tools.

The lamp we want in our pursuit of nobility of character is the light of the knowledge of God's will and law. Pray to Him for strength and insight and grace, and not only pray but work for them, and they will guide you along the path that leads to human virtue and happiness. Thus you will prove yourselves beacon-lights and lamps, throwing light upon the dark places of the world; and other people seeing your good works will, through them, glorify your Father which is in heaven.

A FREE SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY.

IT has been the honourable privilege of Manchester College, for more than a hundred years, to maintain the principle of intellectual and spiritual freedom, both for teachers and taught, in the study of theology and the work of preparation for the ministry. When the founders of the College, in 1786, claimed that privilege, it was to them no new thing, for the principle of freedom had already been tested through generations of their history, from the early days of Nonconformity, in the religious fellowship of their churches, and in a continuous line of academies for the education of their ministers.

At the Centenary of the College, in 1886, the memory of RICHARD BAXTER was rightly recalled, as the chief representative among the earliest Nonconformists of that faith in freedom and a truly catholic spirit, which have been so potent in establishing our ideal of religious fellowship, and of the right method both for teaching and learning in theology. "His plea for liberty," said Dr. MARTINEAU at the Centenary Soirée, "rested not on despair of adequate guidance, but on the security of it for all honest seekers after light."

Another name rightly recalled was that of RICHARD FRANKLAND, whose academy for the education of ministers, opened at Rathmel in 1670, stood first in the honourable succession of which Manchester College is the present representative. We quoted last week, in some notes taken from the Seedsower, a passage from the Rev. ALEXANDER GORDON'S Centenary Address, in which he traced the succession of the Academies from FRANKLAND'S, at Rathmel, and, in conclusion, spoke of our College as "certainly undenominational, unlimited even to what we are glad to think to be the broadest of the denominations." We ask renewed attention here to the whole concluding passage of Mr. GORDON'S address. Thus he spoke of Manchester College:—

We cannot call it either Presbyterian or Unitarian exclusively, inasmuch as it has always welcomed with open heart and hand students of every religious body. So it was in FRANKLAND'S time; so it was at Warrington; so at Kendal; so at Manchester. I think the name which stands second on the roll of divinity students of Manchester College is that of one who is specified as a student of "Divinity in the Church." That addition shows that, in the sense of extending more than a transient hospitality to those whose views may differ very widely from the cherished convictions entertained by its founders, this College rightly claims to be an undenominational institution. As we look back upon its history, we may feel a deepening reverence for the men who made it, and for the men whom it has made; and we may trust that in the years to come, as they roll forward, GOD may continue to help His servants to guide the fortunes of an institution which connects the frank religious fearlessness of the early days of Nonconformity with the frank, fearless religiousness of this present time. Attached to the shield of arms of RICHARD FRANKLAND is a noble motto, which the heirs of FRANKLAND'S work might well adopt as their own, Libera terra, liberque animus; that is to say, Be the spirit of our College so liberal, frank, and large as ever to justify its place in this land, "where, girt with friends and foes, a man may speak the thing he will," and where, in consequence, "freedom broadens slowly down, from precedent to precedent."

We have to consider now what is the full meaning of our freedom, and how in Manchester College it may be put to the best possible use.

In our Free Churches we are united simply as worshippers of GOD, taking our life as His gift, desiring to be led in His way. All truth, we are convinced, is His, and we must be open to the light from whatever side it comes. We are aware that we know only in part, but we are in GOD'S hand, and our part is simply to be true to that measure of truth which is revealed to us, and to live out to the utmost that life of service to which we are called. It is a joyous thing to know that ours is a growing life, that there is more light to be revealed, and that by the way of simple faithfulness our hearts may be so enlarged as to be capable of receiving a larger measure of the truth of GOD.

So also it must be in our College. There also we are in the presence of divine truth, acknowledging the light to be divine, but knowing also that we have only grasped a partial measure of it. Truth as known and interpreted by us must be progressive, reaching ever upward to more perfect vision. We must be always open to the light, bound by no limitations of fixed dogma in our reading of history and religious literature, in our study of the fundamental facts of the religious life, in our sincere endeavour to attain only to the truth. Freedom of intellect and conscience there must be, both for teacher and taught in our free College; that we declare to be the true principle of study and the true method in teaching. Therefore the College is nonconformist and non-subscribing in its essential principle, because it cannot be compelled to conform to the creed of any church, and its teachers must be free to be led not to any foregone conclusions, but in the way of living truth alone.

At the centenary of the College its declaration of principle was re-affirmed in a resolution moved by Dr. Martineau and seconded by the Rev. John Hamilton Thom:—

That, as Trustees of the College, meeting for the first time since the completion of its hundredth year, we record our serious judgment that its fundamental principle of free teaching and free learning has been amply vindicated by a century's experience; our gratitude for the release at the old National Universities of all departments of study save one from the pressure of exclusive tests; and our conviction that while this exception continues the duty is still imposed of here securing to Theology—embracing the supreme objects of human thought—an unrestricted application of enlarging knowledge, the perennial freshness of unbidden faith, and the varying inspirations of personal devotion.

What the College has continually to aim at, is to secure for its students the most efficient teaching, from men imbued with its spirit, and amid the vigorous movements of independent thought united in a reverent openness to truth, and loyal to the undogmatic principle of the foundation. It is in such fellowship of study and personal inspiration that we desire the men preparing for ministry in our Free Churches to be trained, and surely we can only rejoice if others also are ready to come in and enlarge the range of sympathy and outlook upon the world of thought and life, and the strength of a common purpose devoted to the highest service.

To some of our friends it appears to be a scandal that the College should offer such training to men who may be preparing for ministry in a conformist church. That was not the attitude of the founders of the College, and if men are willing to be trained in an atmosphere of freedom, and we have the means to help them to it, what valid reason can there be why we should not give them a cordial welcome? What they intend to do in the matter of conformity and subscription is for their own conscience. We believe it to be a false and crippling condition for a religious man, and, above all, a religious teacher, to accept, and both in our Churches and our College we desire to show a better way. Perchance a student who within the College has grown accustomed to the atmosphere of freedom, and in its teachers has seen demonstrations of its spiritual power, will find that, after all, it is impossible for him to bind himself to a conformist church; but in any case, in accordance with the fundamental principle of the College, the issue of his unfettered study must be left to his own conscience and conviction, and a guidance higher than our own.

As a conclusion to this article, we are glad to be allowed to add here the following clear statement of what Dr. DRUMMOND, Principal of the College, holds to be the true ideal in this matter—a statement taken from a letter which he has just addressed to the Trustees:—

"It is our trust and our privilege to impose no fetters of an artificial authority on the intellect of those who come to study with us; but we have no rule which authorises us to impose a test of the open mind, and to require our students to have no settled convictions and no definite purpose of preaching in the future a certain type of theology. To say that by our openness is meant that a man may take no obligations upon himself before GOD seems to me a most extraordinary misinterpretation of our principle. I fear such a rule would bring us only men of weak and vacillating intellect, who would be mere cyphers in the religious history of our country. We want men who know what they are about when they come to us, men of high faith and strong purpose, who nevertheless know the fallibility of human judgment and the infinite reaches of divine truth. It is only in this frame of mind that men who looked forward to taking Holy Orders would ever come to us, or remain with us—unless, indeed, some one might apply through paltry motives, with which, I presume, we should know how to deal. You must trust the discretion of your officers in all such cases, and not reduce our ancient professions to a pretence. The probability of our having men who are firmly resolved to take Orders is at present almost infinitesimal; but I will frankly say that I should unfeignedly rejoice if the time should come when a few Churchmen should say, Come, and let us go up to Manchester College before we finally commit ourselves, for there the God of Truth is worshipped, and the soul opens its powers before Him, unrestrained by human interference and reproach; and there are faithful teachers who revere the rights of intellect and conscience, who see the spirit through the form, and seek not to impose their own ideas or policy, but to lead their students to that higher service where the converging thoughts of men meet in the unity of spiritual truth, and sectarianism dies away in adoration of the Universal Father."

A MEETING is to be held by the Humanitarian League at Essex Hall, on Wednesday evening, November 23, when there will be a debate on "Non-Resistance." The chief speakers will be Mr. Aylmer Maude, well-known as an exponent of Tolstoy's views, and Captain Arthur St. John (late Royal Inniskilling Fusiliers) who took an active part in the removal of the Doukhobors to Canada. Mr. J. F. Green will take the chair at eight o'clock.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[The Editor is not responsible for the opinion expressed by correspondents. LETTERS CANNOT BE INSERTED WITHOUT THE WRITER'S NAME; and all private information should be accompanied by the name and address of the sender.]

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

SIR,—The vote of the trustees of Manchester College, to be taken on the 29th inst., is of such far-reaching importance that I venture to ask your permission to say a few words with reference to it.

I do not propose to discuss the points that have been raised on either side in the literature that has been circulated among the trustees. I wish very briefly to indicate what appears to me to be the position of Manchester College.

Two conditions have governed its status. The primary motive of its founders was the desire to establish a place of both secular and theological education for English Protestant Dissenters. It was their benefit they had in view. It was to them, naturally and inevitably, that they looked for funds, and it is by their successors that Manchester College has ever since been maintained.

The kind of College they desired to establish was one absolutely catholic in spirit and in fact—one that should be "open to every denomination',' that should be for "the welfare of mankind," that should be "ranked under no distinguishing name," and that should be "dedicated to Truth, Liberty, and Religion." That, and nothing less, was their conception of the principle, which they desired should be incorporated in their College.

The motive that impelled them, and the principle that inspired them are perfectly plain and perfectly consistent: the one was due to the needs of the time, and the other was a far-reaching and noble ideal. Still, after a hundred and twenty years our Free Churches need Manchester College, and still its great ideal is unfulfilled elsewhere. In our remembrance of the special purpose, are we to forget or to abandon the larger thought? But that is what the Resolution, to be moved on the 29th inst., proposes when it seeks to define the College as a "Non-subscribing, Protestant Dissenting Institution." This limits the scope of the College to the personal needs which impelled its founders to establish it, while they asserted with an almost passionate earnestness that they had an aim that transcended their immediate motive; the one was particular and special, the other catholic and universal.

The trustees on the 29th inst. will decide whether the College is to remain, as hitherto, unpledged to any denomination though it owes to Protestant Dissenters both its inception and its continuance, or whether that vital characteristic is to disappear, and with it the band of able and devoted teachers who have made its name respected in the University of Oxford, and whose place it will be impossible adequately to fill. This being the issue, the most momentous that has yet been raised in the life of the College, I would earnestly support the appeal that has been made to every trustee to do his utmost to come to the meeting at Oxford on the 29th inst., and there vote to the best of his judgment.

For myself, I feel strongly that the Resolution, in stating that "the historical principle of Manchester College is that it is a Non-subscribing, Protestant Dissenting Institution," is wholly erroneous. It is, indeed, the historical fact, which none desire to minimise, that the College is the offspring and the home of English Presbyterian Dissenters; but the historical principle, which from the first has animated it, is one that knows no such denominational limitation. It is a principle that must ever be associated with the College, and which will endure when Nonconformity has become a meaningless and superfluous term, since the only conformity demanded by Church and University will then be allegiance to the spirit of truth. RUSSELL SCOTT.

Bognor, Nov. 14.

SIR,—I have been looking over the list of Ministers in the Essex Hall Year Book, and I find that out of the total number of 373, more than 60 have received their theological training in the colleges of other denominations, which is a very large proportion indeed. We are thus debtors to all the churches—Roman Catholic, Anglican, Presbyterian, Congregational, Baptist, Methodist, and the rest. We are being served by many ministers, including some of conspicuous ability and culture, whose training has cost us nothing. Bearing this indebtedness in mind, and looking at the College question from the highest point of view, should we be justified in denying the privileges of the College to men who, following their conscientious preferences, mean to enter the ministry of churches other than our own? Nay, in the sight of God, that would not be just, generous, or grateful of us. And, besides, were we to adopt such an exclusive policy, we should certainly keep men away from the College who might enter our ministry, whilst we could not ensure that everyone who received the benefits of the College would afterwards find his life work in our corner of the Master's vineyard. Let the College authorities be left perfectly free to admit whomsoever they will; let there be no denominational test for those who seek to become its students; then, if some men do pass from its walls to serve in other churches, we may at least have the satisfaction of feeling that we have repaid these churches something of what we owe for the good men and true who have come to us from them. J. M. CONNELL.

Exeter, November 15, 1904.

SIR,—The forty-five trustees who signed the requisition for the special meeting certainly did not know of any instance in which a bursary or exhibition had been given to a declared candidate for Holy Orders, and they said so. They knew that the Committee in June last year encouraged a student to retain an exhibition which he had honourably surrendered, because he no longer intended to enter the Non-subscribing Ministry, but was going to take Orders in the Church of England. Happily the student felt himself unable to accept their offer. In protesting against such an offer being made, the trustees were at least taking the first opportunity afforded to them of objecting to such a perversion of the funds of Protestant Dissenters.

But Dr. Drummond's revelation about Mr. Oliver's case will be startling to more than the forty-five. If it can be substantiated that Mr. Oliver "all through his course professed to belong to the Church of England," and yet received a bursary, here is another very serious ground of complaint; for the trustees generally have certainly not been made aware of such a fact until now. The Report for 1881 states that Mr. Oliver for his first session (1879-80) "was allowed to attend the College on his own foundation, free to lectures." In the summer of 1880 he received a grant from the Liberal Dissenters' Endowment Fund to enable him to prepare for his degree. A reference to the Essex Hall Year Book will show that this fund is available for Protestant Dissenters only. It would be strange if Mr. Oliver was a declared Churchman at that time, and it was just at that time, when this grant was procured for him, that he was admitted conditionally on the foundation. Was it not a fact, that while on the foundation Mr. Oliver preached for some of our free congregations? Unfortunately he died while still a student. There is nothing in the Annual Reports to indicate that he was a Churchman. He may have been in an uncertain condition of mind, as was a well-known alumnus of the College at one time. No one would object to the continuance of his bursary during such a spiritual crisis. But if he had declared his definite intention of taking Orders, our contention is that the bursary ought to have been stopped. While admission to the College lectures may reasonably be free to all deserving students, the exhibitions or bursaries ought to be reserved for those who avow their intention to enter the Non-subscribing Ministry.

The Dr. Daniel Jones Fund with a small reservation is at present administered by Manchester College, by consent of the trustees, whose names have been suggested by the Committee of the College, and the Trust is to be applied by direction of the founder, "so as never to confer any direct benefit upon any person or persons belonging to any Society or Foundation Associated or Established on Exclusive Sectarian principles, or confined to those professing or subscribing any Doctrinal Creed or Article." Your readers may judge whether such a trust may be legally or properly applied by way of grant to a man who is pledged to Creed and Articles.

ARTHUR W. FOX.

Fielden Temperance Hotel, Todmorden.

SIR,—It has been asserted that the "historical statement" authorised by the 45 protesting trustees was circulated anonymously.

It is difficult to account for such a misunderstanding. Each statement was accompanied by a copy of the requisition for a special meeting, giving the names of the 45 trustees in question.

There cannot be any question, either of anonymity or of intention to create a belief that the "historical statement" was issued by any body of persons save the 45 trustees above alluded to.

JNO. HARRISON.

Seaford, November 16.

SIR,—As one of the "forty-five Requisitionists," I take strong exception to the statement appended to an "Explanatory Address" dated 1st inst., which I understand has been sent to all the Trustees, viz., that "This 'Explanatory Address,' as well as the 'Historical Statement,' emanates from the forty-five Trustees who signed the Requisition."

I was abroad during practically the whole of October, and never saw either of these publications until my return, neither was I consulted in any way either as to their contents or as to the desirability of issuing them. How it can be said, therefore, that they "emanate" from me—even to the extent of one forty-fifth part—I am at a loss to understand, and I wish to disclaim all responsibility for them.

I joined in the Requisition because it seemed (and still seems) to me that this question is one which should be fully discussed and settled by the Trustees, but I was careful to explain that my doing so was not to be taken as necessarily implying approval of the Resolution.

If I am able to attend the meeting at Oxford on 29th inst., I shall endeavour to do so with an open mind, as, although I have received a mass of literature both for and against Mr. Harrison's motion, I do not suppose that the "last word" has been said on the subject.

H. WOOLCOTT THOMPSON.

November 14, 1904.

SIR,—It is, perhaps, well that I should explain two points in the recent controversy on Manchester College. They are matters of fact which directly concern myself.

(1) An anonymous writer, in an address to the Trustees, affirms that I "occupied the College pulpit,' though it was my own "declared wish" not to do so. Dr. Drummond has given to these words their only natural interpretation. I say, therefore, clearly and emphatically, that I made no declaration of any kind which the Principal either declined to accept or persuaded me to withdraw. He released me from preaching in my turn as soon as I asked him to do so. I have a vague recollection that a gentleman spoke to me on the subject in the summer of 1903, and it may be to this that Mr. C. J. Street refers as a declaration made "to one of the requisitionists." I reply that the conversation, if I identify it aright, was purely casual, that it took place at an evening party; that I did not introduce the subject; that I did not even know that the gentleman in question was a trustee. I was not aware at the time that any objection had been made to my preaching. It is rather hard that I should have to argue on a private and absolutely informal interview held so long ago, and to which I attached no importance whatever.

(2) Mr. C. J. Street, in a letter to you, has referred to a visit with which he honoured me last March. Then, speaking for himself and for some other trustees, he said that he "was not prepared to take further steps in regard to my position." Subsequently he wrote to say that having signed the paper drawn up by the Principal and my colleagues, I had myself cancelled this "understanding between us." No such "understanding" ever existed. I did not ask, I don't know now in whose name Mr. C. J. Street spoke. Most assuredly I never dreamed of continuing in my present place at the sufferance of Mr. C. J. Street and his friends, and he is strangely mistaken if he takes my silence for consent to all he said at an interview for which I was wholly unprepared.

WM. ADDIS.

Oxford, November 16

SIR,—In common with other Trustees, I have lately received certain literature which leaves no doubt that measures are in preparation for an assault upon the position of Mr. Addis. Perhaps some of my fellow Trustees may not clearly realise whom or what they are thus invited to assail, and be willing, therefore, to listen to a few words of inside testimony bearing on the matter. Upon the question of propriety I will offer but one remark. Should the authors of this literature say to me: "Since you are a Trustee, you must receive our pamphlets and listen to our arguments, but since you are a tutor"—or, as Mr. Monks would remind me, "a servant"—"of the College, you must not reply," I can only answer that I decline to accept so ingenuously one-sided a statement of the position.

Briefly, then, I would say that whoever supports the movement against Mr. Addis is the opponent of one of the most truly broadening and elevating influences of which Manchester College has ever enjoyed the benefit. I have peculiar pleasure in bearing this testimony to the work of my colleague, and no hesitation at all in placing that testimony before the Trustees. And if I am told that "the question is one of principle," I must add "the question is also one of fact," and the fact is precisely what I have said. I would add further that for me, at least, the principle which governs the whole situation is that of which the above fact affords such a happy illustration.

All theological colleges, whatever their principles, tend to produce a certain type of "narrowness," the nature of which is well known and justly dreaded by all who have watched these institutions. Over and above the intellectual narrowness from which Manchester College may justly claim to have been so far free, there is a certain moral narrowness, a narrowness of type and character, to the danger of which we are exposed in common with all the rest. Given a small number of men, with fairly uniform antecedents and with a common aim in life, living together in close association day after day, cut off by the needs of study from active contact with the great world, and surrounded on all sides by a host of academic traditions—and you have conditions which may and often do result in producing one of the narrowest types, whether of man or minister. Such men are likely to be failures in any ministry; but especially in "our" ministry, with its profession of wide human and intellectual sympathies.

Nothing is of greater importance to us, whether Trustees or tutors, than to guard our men from the mischief to type, character, and efficiency which results from the "narrowing" conditions of a theological seminary.

In this direction Mr. Addis has had an influence in Manchester College the value of which it is impossible to over-estimate. Some have defended his position on the mere negative ground that he "has not proselytised," which, of course, is true. Others, again, have referred to his great merits as a teacher, which are admitted by all. But we who work with him have better reasons than these for counting his influence as a priceless contribution in the work of educating men as large-minded ministers of the Gospels.

Let it be granted, though the proposition is disputable, that the main or sole purpose of the College is to train "our" ministers for "our" churches. Even so, I venture to submit, that no more valuable influence, for that particular purpose, could possibly be brought to bear on all of us — both teachers and taught — than that which Mr. Addis has exercised, and is exercising within these College walls. I hesitate not to say that he has made the tone of Manchester College broader, healthier, manlier, and, above all, more religious. He has brought a breath of new life into our little world. He has enlarged the type of Christian manhood here cultivated. He has given moral breadth to the training of the men, and helped to make us all feel that we are citizens of a larger city. If that is proselytising—be it so. I would gladly be counted one of the proselytes. And deeply do I feel that to lose such an influence from our College life would be a supreme calamity to all who cherish freedom in its larger, positive sense.

Once more, then, we are asked to declare whether we place the higher value on opinions or on men. Attempts to oust from their positions men of high character because of theological offence are, alas, familiar. They have always been made in the name of "principle," but history has set the mark of stern disapproval on every one. Such proceedings, one and all, have become, in after years, sources of bitter repentance; have been recognised as blots in the record; have caused mischiefs which could never be undone. Their result, disguised as momentary success, has changed through contact with larger issues into disaster and humiliation. If the authors of the present attempt think the warning lesson does not apply to them they will find themselves mistaken. In their essence the cases are all of one type; the symbols of the equation may differ, but the values represented are ever the same. L. P. JACKS.

SIR,—Mr. Upton has written a letter of great importance, which has been circulated among the Trustees of Manchester College, dealing with the matter to be dealt with at the special meeting on the 29th inst.—a letter to which he referred in what he wrote in your columns last week. His letter will appeal to many not merely because of its arguments, but because of the reverence and affection which we feel to towards him. He, however, like Dr. Martineau, has always urged his students to think for themselves, and in considering his letter it is our duty to put aside personal feelings towards him and to think only of the argument.

Mr. Upton draws a picture of the kind of miscellaneous disunited collection of teachers and students of all sects, to which, he says, the Professor's letter leads. This picture may or may not be attractive; it certainly has some advantages, which Mr. Upton passes by, and would save men from the narrowness to which they are liable when associating continually and closely with a small number of students and professors, who all of them belong to much the same school of thought. But the important point is that this is no new and sudden danger, as it is made to appear. Anyone might have drawn the same picture from the first, either about Manchester College or our free chapels. Indeed, many people have threatened us with disaster owing to our free trusts; they have tried to frighten us with the probability of being captured by Anglicanism or orthodox dissent. What is there to prevent it? they ask triumphantly. If you don't make Unitarianism, or non-subscription, or something opposed to orthodoxy, a test of membership, what is there to prevent Anglicans or Wesleyans taking sittings? What is there to prevent a hopeless chaos of opinions, or even the dire result that the Wesleyans might be in the majority and appoint a Wesleyan minister?

To that frenzied appeal we can only reply that not only has the result not occurred, but that there is not the slightest sign of its occurrence. We still venture to keep our chapels free, and can sleep at night in spite of these pictures of the logical possibilities involved by freedom. Mr. Upton's description of the "kind of college which the Professor's letter appears to forecast" is a bogie, an imaginary Japanese torpedo boat thousands of miles away from its base! The danger is remotely possible, no doubt, but as a practical fact it doesn't exist.

Mr. Upton's letter gives the impression that the Professors and Committee are asking for new powers and seeking to make a new departure. The Professors and Committee are asking the Trustees to leave things exactly as they have been from the beginning. It is Mr. Street and his party who wish to define what has not yet been defined, to limit what has not been limited. Whatever differences of opinion there may be as to the meaning of various historical statements—and, being a free college, these statements have naturally varied from time to time—it is perfectly certain that no definite Nonconformist resolution binding the College to Nonconformity for all time, like that of Mr. Harrison, has ever been passed before. It is an entirely new policy. The Committee and Professors ask the Trustees to remain true to the old policy. Let them keep the management of the College unfettered in their own hands. Let them not attempt to define limits, or to bind their successors for all time, but leave men free to deal with new circumstances and new thoughts as they arise.

There is one great good which may result from the present controversy if personal quarrelling is avoided. It may awaken deeper interest among our churches in the open theological school founded by our forefathers and now established at Oxford. It may teach the Committee that they should be in closer touch with the Trustees, and the Trustees that they should give more help to the Committee.

The College needs the thought and help of all to make it more efficient, more influential. It does not realise at present the hopes of those who established it at Oxford. Instead of splitting us into two opposing parties over a resolution which would have no practical result whatever—except that of turning Mr. Addis out, a result which even the innovators would deplore, and making serious difficulties in the way of grants to Asiatics and Hungarians—it seems a pity that we cannot unite on reform and efficiency. There can be no question that Professors and Committee would welcome suggestions and help towards making the College what it is to some extent, but what it ought to be much more—a vital centre of liberal religious thought and life, from which young men would be sent forth full of enthusiasm and power to speak of the things of the spirit and the reality of God.

HENRY GOW.

NOTICE.—In the Manchester College correspondence, if there are to be more letters next week, we beg our friends to note that we cannot undertake to publish any letters which reach the office later than noon on Wednesday.

A SPECIALLY summoned and largely attended meeting of the Upper Chapel (Sheffield) Fellowship Fund was held on Sunday last when the following resolution was unanimously carried.—

That in the opinion of this meeting Manchester College, Oxford, is a Protestant Dissenting Institution, and that its scholarships and bursaries should not be given to students pledged to the Church of England.

"I DO not say that all our past transitions have been made wholly without heat and friction; I am old enough to recollect crowded meetings, eager speeches, a resolute appeal to the principle of freedom on this side, a reluctant doubt as to its universal applicability on that; but the principle has always triumphed, and more, personal friendships and kindly co-operation have been saved. It is possible, though I see no present cloud upon the horizon, that other troubles of this kind may yet await us; if so, I do not fear that the principle which has stood the strain of a hundred years, and such controversies as I have indicated, will fail those who reverently apply it. And I repeat, that I appeal to the history of the College to vindicate its principle. No institution, I think, has ever been carried so peacefully, so honestly, by so natural a a course of development, with so little loss of friends, through so wide a cycle of change."—Dr. Charles Beard, Visitor's Address, in the Centenary Year of Manchester College.

WE understand ourselves better, our conceptions grow clearer, by the very effort to make them clear to another.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCITEY.

AUTUMN MEETING.

ESSEX HALL has not often looked so festive as it did on Wednesday evening at the autumn meeting of the London District Unitarian Society. A profusion of white chrysanthemums and other flowers, with palms, at the entrance and in the hall itself, made a delightful setting for the reception given by the President and Mrs. Chatfeild Clarke in the earlier part of the evening, and there was an unusually large and representative attendance of members and friends to enjoy the social hour and the music which the host and hostess had provided. This consisted of pianoforte solos by Miss Evelyn Suart and songs by Miss Alys Bateman, which were very warmly appreciated.

The PRESIDENT took the chair towards eight o'clock, and after the Rev. J. E. Stronge had announced a number of letters of regret for non-attendance, offered a a hearty welcome to the friends who were present. The object of the autumn meeting, he said, was specially of a social nature, as, indeed, it was one of the original objects of the Society to bring the members of their London churches more closely together in friendly intercourse. He then spoke of the difficulty the churches had in reaching the people, and quoted a remark of Mr. Charles Booth's that the great masses of the people remained apart from all forms of religion, apparently untouched by the Gospel. It was not to be expected so long as they lived in such a state of over-crowding in cities, that the higher influences could reach them. They must do more to improve their homes, take them further from the centres and give them the first necessities of life, light, air, and water, before they could hope to touch the people with the Gospel. He quoted figures to show what terrible overcrowding there was in London, and paid a tribute to the County Council for what they were doing for housing and better sanitation. Their churches, and especially the missions, could help a great deal in their efforts towards bettering the condition of the people. He spoke with warm appreciation of the work Mr. Wicksteed had done for their Society during the past two years, and mentioned specially the founding of the Laymen's Club and the Choral Society. In conclusion he referred to the appeal they were making for the building of churches for the Kilburn, Lewisham, and Plumstead congregations. All three congregations had made good progress and showed vigorous life, but it was impossible for them to do their proper work under existing circumstances; but they were in possession of good freehold sites, and it was essential that churches should be built for them. The appeal was for £7,500, and they had now £3,000 in hand. He made an earnest appeal to London Unitarians to provide the rest.

SIR EDWIN DURNING-LAWRENCE, Bart., M.P., a past president of the Society, was the first speaker to be called upon, and he contrasted the condition of religion at the present time with what it was fifty years ago, and the faith of a Unitarian with that of a holder of the old Orthodox beliefs. It was their happiness to feel that they had a Father in heaven, in whom they believe with mind and heart and soul. They wanted to give people a religion of common-sense, a religion of being, not of seeming to be. A man could not get rid of himself, and their religion would teach him so to live that he might not despise himself.

DR. BURT ESTES HOWARD, formerly Presbyterian minister of Los Angelos, California, at present studying in London, then gave an eloquent address on the true Unitarianism, as a living, practical faith, which would command the respect and adhesion of the people. (His address we hope to print in full next week.)

Mr. J. C. MACKY, of Auckland, New Zealand, followed with a brief speech of hearty thanks to friends in London for the help they had given towards the building the first Unitarian church in New Zealand, and of special thanks on his own account, because, to him, as a member of a Presbyterian Church who had previously known nothing of Unitarianism, Mr. Jellie's preaching had brought new light and satisfaction, for which he was deeply grateful. Not only Mr. Jellie's preaching and attractive personality, but the literature which had been sent over, was exercising a steady influence in the country, and he hoped it would not be long before they had more than one church in New Zealand.

Dr. HERBERT SMITH then spoke, as a fighting Unitarian, and one who would gladly rouse the slumbering and indifferent Unitarians of London to greater energy, and a sense of their responsibility to share with others the faith and the privileges they themselves enjoyed. He pointed to a decline since 1890 in the number of subscribers, and the amount of the subscriptions to that Society, as discreditable to the body, and yet he was confident that there was new life stirring in their younger men, and the younger churches; and was convinced that they must gird themselves up for a great fight, which they would have to face in the future, between the Roman Catholic Church and the holders of Unitarian beliefs.

A vote of thanks to the President was moved by the Rev. W. C. POPE, and seconded by Mr. HOWARD YOUNG, both speaking very warmly of the energy which Mr. Chatfeild Clarke had thrown into the work, and the admirable manner in which he conducted the business of the Society, Mr. Young also including Mrs. Clarke's name in the resolution, with a word of thanks for the very pleasant entertainment of that evening. This brought the proceedings to a close.

HE rested liberty of conscience on the plea, not of the common helplessness of men which left them without an arbiter, but on a common moral nature and spiritual unity which might leave them in identical relations with God amid great varieties of judgment with each other. By thus shifting the conditions of harmony with God from the understanding to the affections and the will, he opened the only way of binding the deepest pieties and the sweetest charities together. He gave a new expansion to the powers of thought by flinging off the fear lest a fallacy in logic should bring ruin to the soul, and by seeing in every dawning of reasonable doubt a call of sacred duty instead of a seduction of diabolical temptation; and so, recalling all the suspicious sentinels that had been posted at every entrance to the human mind, he released it from compression, and sent it, not with permission only, but with the Divine benediction, on its own free course, to read the meaning of things on earth and things in heaven.—James Martineau on Richard Baxter.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Aberdare.—On Tuesday night, Nov. 15, an interesting meeting was held in the vestry of the Old Meeting House, when the church presented Mr. Gwilym Griffiths with a valuable timepiece on the occasion of his marriage, as a mark of respect for his services as a member of the church and its faithful secretary during the past ten or twelve years. The meeting, which was held on "Christian Endeavour" night, was introduced with reading and prayer by Mr. Tyssul Davies. The chair was occupied by a venerable member of the church, Mr. E. D. Howell.

Belper (Resignation).—After nearly fifty years of service as student and minister to several congregations, the Rev. J. Kertain Smith has resigned his position here on account of age and increasing debility. The congregation, in accepting Mr. Smith's resignation, have passed a resolution of warm gratitude and appreciation of their minister's faithful services. Mr. and Mrs. Smith intend still to reside at Belper.

Bolton: Bank Street.—Alderman John Heywood has been appointed Mayor of Bolton for a second year, and on Sunday evening he attended service at Bank-street, accompanied by members of the Corporation. The collections during the day were on behalf of the infirmary, and realised £24 8s. Mr. Weatherall's lectures of religious instruction at the Spinners' Hall continue to be largely attended, and it is reckoned that about a third of the audiences consists of strangers. The subject of the third lecture, on November 8, was Anti-Materialism, and the fourth lecture, given last Tuesday evening, argued that "Goodness is Stronger than Evil."

Bradford, Yorks.—The monthly meeting of the Chapel-lane Literary Society was held on Monday evening, when Professor Charles Jacot, B. es L. gave an eloquent and deeply interesting lecture on Tennyson. The Rev. E. Ceredig Jones presided.

Cardiff.—In connection with the newly-formed Sunday-school Guild, a very pretty fairy-tale play, entitled "The Sleeping Beauty," was performed by a party of little children in the West Grove schoolroom on Monday evening, November 14. Some elder friends also contributed to the evening's entertainment, which was a thorough success,

Chatham.—Last Sunday evening the first of a series of addresses upon "Difficult Sayings of Jesus," was given at Hamond Hill Church by the Rev. J. Tyssul Davis. The addresses are to be followed by conferences for discussion of the topics dealt with. The first four of the topics are (1) "Blessed are ye poor," (2) "Take no thought for the morrow," (3) "Love your enemies," (4) "Resist not evil." The chair at the conference last Sunday was taken by Mr. Mackay, the editor of the Chatham and Rochester Observer. Eight speakers took part in the discussion, which was carried on quietly and reverently, and gave token of proving useful and helpful.

Chowbent.—A united party of the Chowbent Leigh, and Astley congregations was held at Chowbent on Nov. 5. After tea Rev. J. J. Wright presided, and the speakers were Revs. R. S. Redfern, Peter Holt, A. H. Dolphin, R. T.

Herford, B.A., and Mr. Thomas Harwood. Vocal and instrumental music, by members of the different congregations, was given at intervals. The meeting was of a hearty character; the speeches earnest and practical.

Hastings.—The church here has sustained a very severe loss through the removal of Mr. F. A. Harrison and family to London. Mr. Harrison, since he came to reside in Hastings, has warmly interested himself in the welfare of the church, serving on the committee and acting as treasurer. The members of the congregation keenly feel the severance of the friendly ties which the generous disposition of Mr. and Mrs. Harrison had made so strong. On Oct. 28, at a social gathering held in the church, a very handsome illuminated address was presented to Mr. Harrison by the Rev. Gardner Preston, on behalf of the congregation, as an expression of their high esteem and regard for him and Mrs. Harrison.

Hinckley (Appointment).—The Rev. T. J. Jenkins of Trebanos, Swansea Valley, has received and accepted a unanimous invitation from the congregation of the great meeting to become their minister. Mr. Jenkins enters on his duties the first Sunday in February next.

Lewes.—Mr. J, H. Every, the Mayor of Lewes, has been re-elected to that office for the coming year, and last Sunday he again attended, with the Corporation, the morning service at the Westgate Chapel. The service was conducted by the Rev. J. Felstead, and the sermon, from Phil. i. 22, was an exposition of the work man is called to do both upon his own nature, and upon the world around him, and a setting forth of the noble fruit of noble worth.

Liscard.—The congregation of the Memorial Church has lost a loyal member through the somewhat sudden death of Mr. J. Birkett Fisher, on Saturday last, at the age of 57. A native of Newcastle-on-Tyne, Mr. Fisher came early to Liverpool, and had a successful career as an auctioneer in the employ of Messrs. Branch and Leete. He had considerable knowledge of art, and was one of the founders of the "Liver" Sketching Club. One of the kindest hearted of men, he helped to establish the Christmas free dinners in St. George's Hall, and was connected with a number of philanthropic institutions in Wallasey. He was a staunch Radical, but the genial friend of men of all parties. The funeral service on Tuesday was conducted in the Memorial Church, and afterwards at the Wallasey cemetery, by the Rev. A. E. Parry, in the presence of a large concourse of friends.

Liverpool: Hope-street.—The People's Services held during October in the Mount-street Institute were so successful that they are to be continued during November; the subjects of the addresses by the Revs. R. A. Armstrong and H. D. Roberts, under the general title, "Christianity and Present Day Problems," deal with the Family, the City, the State, and the World.

London: George's Row Domestic Mission.—The London County Council has appointed the Rev. F. Summers as its representative manager on the committee of the Parochial non-provided Church Schools, Old-street, St. Luke's, E.C., which has existed on an old foundation (1698), and clothes a large number of its scholars. The school is divided into infants, girls, and boys, with separate head teachers and a considerable staff.

London: Plumstead.—The Rev. L. Jenkins Jones, Mayor of Woolwich, has been re-elected to that office for the coming year.

London: Wandsworth.—The Church having already celebrated its "coming of age," it is now the turn of the Sunday School, which was opened on Nov. 19, 1883. The anniversary is to be celebrated to-morrow (Sunday) by special services, conducted morning and evening by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, and by a special children's service at 3 in the afternoon, to which friends are cordially invited.

Manchester: Bradford.—The first of a series of popular services was held on Sunday evening, November 6, from 8 to 9, with an attendance of 120 adults. The service consisted of vocal music, and a short address given by the Rev. W. E. Atack. These services are to be held weekly, consisting of lantern services, orchestral and vocal music. On Saturday afternoon last, the new Lecture Hall and additional rooms erected as an annexe to the Mill-street Free Church were formally opened. Councillor Henry Marsden presided, and congratulated all concerned upon the quality and accommodation of the buildings. He was always struck with the need of such an institution for the promotion of education and of social intercourse on unsectarian lines. Dr. Councillor Dreyfus, in declaring the buildings open, said that he could recollect that only a few years ago there was no place of worship of any denomination in that neighbourhood. As a public man he recognised the valuable work which was being done at Mill-street. The population was increasing marvellously, and the growth of their undertaking had also been remarkable. Mr. G. W. R Wood moved, and Mr. T. F. Robinson seconded, a hearty vote of thanks to both chairman and opener. At four o'clock a service was held in the Church, when the devotions were led by the Rev. Charles Roper, and the sermon preached by the Rev. Dendy Agate, President of the District Association. Tea followed, and then a sale of work was held in one of the class-rooms. In the evening there was a public meeting, presided over by the Rev. Dendy Agate, and amongst the speakers announced were the Revs. James Harwood and W. E. Atack, and Messrs. M. Waite, G. W. R. Wood, W. H. Higgin, and C. B. Byles. A very full and varied programme of lectures and classes has been arranged for the winter session. Unfortunately the new buildings were not opened free of debt, about £200 being still required.

Manchester District Association.—The Governing Body paid its last visitation to Cross-street and Lower Mosley-street on Saturday, Nov. 5, at the invitation of the congregations worshipping at those places. Service was held in the afternoon in Cross-street Chapel, the devotions being led by the Rev. E. P. Barrow, and the sermon being preached by the Rev. James Ruddle. Tea was provided in the Lower Mosley-street Schools, where also the evening meeting was held. The latter was presided over by Mr. G. W. Rayner Wood, and the speakers, in addition to the chairman, were the Revs. Dendy Agate and Charles Roper, and Messrs. George Mulliner and Richard Robinson. The attendances were not quite so large as usual, but the proceedings were both impressive and helpful. Visitations have now been paid to all the churches in the district; and invitations are now coming in from some of the churches for second visits, as a result of the encouragement and help derived from the previous meetings.

Mottram.—The Christian Church has just lost one of its old members and a former active worker in the decease of Mr. Thomas Swindells, whose bodily remains were interred on Saturday afternoon, November 12, by the Rev. H. Bodell Smith. On the same day the anniversary tea party was held and was very numerously attended. Mr. Wm. Watts, of Sheffield, a scholar of Mottram in his youthful days, came specially to preside over the evening meeting and entertainment, and delivered an interesting address reminiscent of his former life at Mottram. The excellent programme of songs, recitations, and dialogues included some delightfully rendered action songs by girls of the Sunday-school trained by Mrs. and Miss Smith.

Pepperhill.—On Saturday, Nov. 12, and on Monday, Nov. 14, very successful "At Homes" were held. The Rev. and Mrs. E. Ceredig Jones were host and hostess, on the former date, and the Rev. John and Mrs. Ellis on the latter. A large company assembled on both occasions. Brief speeches of encouragement were made by the hosts and hostesses, and by the Rev. W, H. Eastlake and Mr. Samuel Jaeger. The ladies of the congregation had made the interior of the dilapidated chapel bright with coloured drapery, and comfortable with carpets and home furniture. Vocal and instrumental music and recitals were rendered at intervals by friends. These were the last meetings prior to the chapel being closed for thorough renovation and re-furnishing. The interior will be re-modelled as a school-chapel, and shortly an effort will be made, it is hoped, to erect a suitable building for worship. The good friends in this lonely outpost of our faith are well-deserving of help and sympathy.

Sheffield: Upperthorpe.—In connection with the Literary and Social Union, an excellent recital of Dickens' "Christmas Carol" was given on Nov. 15, by Mr. John Harwood, of Manchester. There was a large and appreciative audience, which filled the schoolroom. The Rev. A. H. Dolphin presided, and at the conclusion a very hearty vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Harwood, proposed by the Rev. C. J. Street, seconded by Mr. W. R. Stevenson, and suitably acknowledged.

To unite mankind together, not by the bonds of ignorance or hypocrisy but by the cement of an enlightened and diffusive love, this is the spirit of that Divine religion in which we boast, this is the tendency of those principles by which we are distinguished; for this is the end and honour of our cause, the cause of Civil and Religious Liberty. Among whatever men and by whatever means the spirit of freedom, of toleration, and of candour, and in connection with these the spirit of virtue and religion are diffused, this we consider as the triumph of our interest: Our interest, did I say? It is the interest of truth, of righteousness, of heaven! An interest which can alone render our separation honourable or important: an interest to support which by steady character, by generous contribution, and, if necessary, by patient suffering, confers on human nature its highest glory, because it produces in man his noblest happiness.—Dr. Thomas Barnes, at the founding of Manchester College, 1786.

NEW UNITARIAN CHURCH, BIRKENHEAD.

IN Birkenhead for many years the dwelling portion of the town has been receding gradually from the neighbourhood of the Unitarian Church, and the consequent decrease in numbers made a change inevitable. From the amount realised by the sale of the old site, the sum of £5,000 was allotted for a new building, and a contract was made at this figure; but, owing chiefly to errors of judgment on the part of professional advisers, the final cost amounted to £7,000, exclusive of the land and of furnishing expenses.

The Congregation has done, and is doing, all that is possible in subscribing and raising money. In addition to subscriptions for the Church Building Fund, between £2,000 and £3,000 have been raised since 1897 for building Schools.

At the beginning of this year the total debt amounted to about £1,800, but this has now been reduced to about £1,100 by the subscriptions recorded below. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association warmly commend the endeavour to clear off the debt, and promise £100 as an expression of their interest, which they trust will be helpful. The Congregation appeal therefore for help to their fellow-worshippers in the Unitarian Body, so that unhampered by debt they may take advantage of the opportunity for increased activity, and spread in Birkenhead that faith which all Unitarians have at heart. Contributions will be gratefully acknowledged by FREDERICK JEVONS (Chairman), Palm Grove, Birkenhead.

A. W. WILLMER (Treasurer), Park-road West, Birkenhead.
E. WALLACE (Finance Secretary), Reedville, Birkenhead.
GEO. DALBY, 22, Devonshire-road, Birkenhead.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

FOR the Priestley Centenary Bazaar, to be held in the Birmingham Town Hall from Wednesday to Saturday next, a most attractive and interesting illustrated historical handbook has been published. The dainty cover bears an embossed reproduction in colours of the Wedgwood medallion of Priestley, and the frontispiece is after Holloway's engraving of Artaud's portrait of Priestley just before he went to America. The handbook contains not only a short biography of Priestley but some brief notes, with lists of ministers, and full-page illustrations of the twenty-three "Presbyterian, Unitarian, and other Liberal Christian Churches" in the Midlands, included in the Union; and also a double page showing portraits of twenty of the ministers. At least £5,000 is the object aimed at in this centenary celebration, and the promised donations already amount to £3,102 13s. 6d. The bazaar, it is hoped, will do the rest. The price of the historical handbook is 2s., and it is well worth it for all who care for our churches and their ministers. Copies will be on sale also at Essex Hall.

AN advertisement of the needs of the Winifred House Convalescent Nursing Home for Children will be found in another column. The admirable work done by this Nursing Home is well known to many of our readers, but the need of maintaining a sufficient income is not always remembered. We trust that this reminder may bring to the devoted workers in the Home all the help they need.

MANY of our readers may be interested to hear that there will be a musical performance of Miss Alice Buckton's mystery play "Eager Heart" on Wednesday, Dec. 7, at 3.0 and 8.15 in Lincoln's Inn Hall, Lincoln's Inn. Tickets at 10s., 7s. 6d., 5s., and 2s. to be had of Montagu Fordham and Co., 9, Maddox-street, Regent-street, W. The subject of the mystery play is the legend of the three kings which exercised such an unfailing fascination in the Middle Ages. We will not anticipate Miss Buckton's treatment further than to say that it illustrates the truth that simple fidelity to the duty closest to hand may often secure the revelation which spiritual ambition, however sincere, misses. In Tennyson's poem Sir Bors has the vision of the Holy Grail, and in spiritual as well as temporal matters they that seek their life often lose it.

THE solidity of the larger section of the Free Church of Scotland, which, in spite of severance, is still called "United Free," was strongly demonstrated by the meetings at Edinburgh on November 15. At the Convocation, 2,740 ministers and elders assembled, and at the evening demonstration 8,000 persons were reckoned. The Convocation determined to issue a Message "from the Church to her people." The Message expresses "a hope of some wise remedy being devised by the wisdom and justice of Parliament." But it is declared, "our deepest confidence does not rest in Parliament." Regarding the immediate duty of the Church, it said, "our duty is to seek, by all suitable efforts, to safeguard property." A reassertion is made of "the right and duty of the Church to reconsider her creed from time to time." But it is explicitly said:—

> Our doctrinal basis is the Confession of Faith, with the explanations contained in the two Declaratory Acts. We are one in receiving the Scripture as given by inspiration of God. Very earnestly we would exhort all whom our words can reach to magnify the Scriptures in their own practice.

THE key-note of Prof. Rainey's speech, as chairman of the Demonstration, was sounded in the words, "They were here free, and they must remain free." Read in the light of the Message, his declaration indicates "freedom to reconsider the language of the past." What will come out of that freedom remains to be seen. The Church has not given any indication of a present intention to go beyond the qualified Confession. Questions of doctrine are in abeyance. The concern of the moment is not with ideas, but with income.

MEANWHILE the section called "Free" is making piecemeal claims upon the property. It has obtained possession of the Assembly Hall and the College in Edinburgh, and the Colleges in Glasgow and Aberdeen are to be given up to it. There is a notable condition attached to the endowment of the Aberdeen College. If the College ceases to be used by the Free Church, the endowment (£40,000) passes to the Aberdeen University. That contingency may occur. The Colleges for training teachers at present managed by the U.F. section may pass over to the State. That will be a great gain to the system of National Education. While the sects wrangle, the nation will benefit.

THE "Free" section has expressed its determination to hold by the Confession of Faith unqualified, and to keep out the Higher Criticism. It is recovering its position in the Highlands, and here and there in the Lowlands it is claiming church buildings. The conflict will be long and bitter. The larger section will be obliged to separate itself more widely in doctrine and policy from the other. Already the cleavage has made it disavow the older Calvinism and explicitly declare its openness to the newer light. But the whole matter is in the seething-pot.

THE situation has been rendered more complicated by the appearance on the field of controversy of the "Free Presbyterian Church." It is composed of those who went out of the Free Church at the passing of the first Declaratory Act. Its Synod met at Glasgow recently, and made certain deliverances. One of them reads thus:—

> The Synod, viewing with alarm the infidel and rationalistic teaching promulgated from theological colleges, pulpits, and the Press concerning the inspiration and infallibility and divine authority of of the Scriptures . . . protests . . . and presses upon all to whom its word may come the soul-ruining effects which are certain to follow from the rationalistic view of Scripture, so far as this view finds footing anywhere.

That may lay the ghost of Calvin, and recompose the bones of the Westminster divines.

THE first number of The Liberal Churchman is just issued, as a small quarterly (Williams & Norgate, 1s. net), the organ of the "Churchmen's Union for the Advancement of Liberal Religious Thought." The first object of the Union is "to maintain the right and duty of the Church to restate her belief from time to time as required by the progressive revelation of the Holy Spirit." Dr. W. D. Morrison, the President of the Union, writes the first article, on "The Task of Liberal Theology." It is a striking article, which, we trust, will be widely read:—"The great conflict at the present moment," says Dr. Morrison, "is not a conflict between faith and unbelief; it is a conflict between the visible and invisible Church—between the living substance of religion and its ancient historic forms: and the Church, as an institution, will not regain its hold upon the minds of men until this struggle has been composed. To bring this conflict to an end is the task of modern theology."

This first number of the Liberal Churchman contains also an article on "Ritschlianism," by Dr. Hastings Rashdall, an article on "Clerical Subscription," by Canon Hensley Henson, and an anonymous article on "Dr. Gore and the Creeds"; but we must be content here with another quotation from Dr. Morrison:—

The ethical and spiritual experience arising out of the effort to lead a Christian life is the real and abiding basis of the Christian faith, and the supreme witness of its worth. The most pressing task of modern theology is to liberate this religious experience from traditional theories which make it dependent on infallible institutions, infallible books, and infallible dogmas. It is these theories which bring religion into conflict and collision with modern conceptions of the world and life.

Modern theology must emancipate the facts of the Christian faith from the mists of theory which have gathered around it in the course of centuries; it must proclaim that men are perfectly free to form what theories they please; it must teach the Church to renounce the inculcation of theories and to announce the great fundamental truth that the Christian faith is not a theory but a profound, transforming ethical and spiritual experience, drawing its vitality from a conviction which transcends experience—a conviction that the spirit of Christ is the incarnate spirit of goodness, that Goodness is the Supreme Reality, and union with it the supreme end of life.

Reference has been made in the Manchester College discussion to Dr. Martineau's earnest wish in 1875 that Colenso should be appointed to the Old Testament chair in the College. His letter to Mr. Thom on this subject should be considered by all who are trying to look upon such a question from every side. It will be found in the "Life," vol. ii. pp. 26—29. One passage we will quote here:—

I do not see that our own rule of abstinence from tests obliges us to set up a test against tests. To put such a strain upon our principles would carry us far beyond our historical usage and habitual feeling. It would forbid us ever to avail ourselves of the instructions of any Confessional Protestant minister. Yet, of our older divines, the freest and most eminent resorted to Leyden and other universities, in which the theological chairs were filled by men of this class; and of our own more recent ministers, some of the highest type have been trained in Dublin, Glasgow, Edinburgh, under similar conditions. . . . And we have always approved of our young ministers resorting to the lecture rooms of such teachers as Schleiermacher, Rothe, Schenkel, Volkmar, Kuenen, &c.—all of them scholars holding office in Confessional Churches. If every minister in a Confessional Church is ipso facto disqualified for our service, it is plain that only a Unitarian is eligible; unless some exceptional layman could be found, devoted to the special studies of the theologian.

On the other hand, for Dr. Martineau's judgment on the subject of clerical subscription see his article on Dr. Arnold, Essays, vol. i. pp. 50—61.

We are glad to welcome the first of a series of "Sermons preached in Bank-street Chapel," by the Rev. J. H. Weatherall. The first sermon is on "Do the Duty that lies Nearest." It is printed in a novel form, very convenient for slipping into the pocket, to read by the way. (G. Winterburn, 65, Deansgate, Bolton. 1d.) The following passage is a good example of the tone of the whole sermon:—

It has been written that "the sum of our pretexts for evading duty is equal to the sum of the sands of the sea, or the stars in heaven." Whatever else is bewildering in the complexities of our time, this is a clear, bright noonday truth, that it is the persistent evasion of these bewilderments that perpetuates them. The brains that have produced battleships because the world wanted battleships are brains that could and might have produced solutions of the problems of drunkenness, if the world had really wanted solutions of that problem. The brains that discovered antiseptic surgery could and might have invented disarmament schemes, if the world had been really serious in its protests against warfare. The brains that have invented wireless telegraphy could and might have invented adjustments between labour and capital, if the world had seriously laid itself out for them; and the brains that discovered X-rays and radium could have no less worked out new lines of co-operation that should heal the sores of suspicion and distrust raised by the years of alienation of class from class. We say regretfully that the world is not really serious towards these better wants; and though our hearts desire universal peace and soberness and brotherhood, though we know that the realisation of any single one of these ideals would send floods of gladness rolling across the earth, we are disposed ourselves to do nothing. They are too big for us, we say; what a pity the big world won't set itself to them, for it has already realised even greater dreams than these. Some day, we suppose, it will want these things really, and then it will plan out the methods to get them. The world? It is we that make the world, just people like us, worried by many things that are not tremendously important, with a lot of little plans for a lot of little purposes, and a terrible trick of shutting our eyes against the sad and serious things because we distrust our duty towards them, or our power of touching them with a finger of healing.

Workers' Aid Society.—The secretary of this Society begs to remind the members that their contributions are due at the end of the current month, or very early in December. The secretary would be very happy to welcome new members to the Society, the object of which is to provide underclothing and children's overalls and flannel bedjackets for the little ones at Winifred House, and stronger and coarser garments to be distributed at the Christmas entertainments of the London Missions. Each member is expected to contribute two garments and an annual subscription of 6d., and the members are reminded that the distress in London is this year unusually severe. Any further information about the Society, which is now in its fifteenth year, will be gladly supplied by its secretary, Mrs. Goodwyn Barmby, Mount Pleasant, Sidmouth.

THE MANCHESTER DOMESTIC MISSION.

The following notice of the admirable work, and the pressing needs of the Domestic Mission, which appeared in the Manchester Guardian of November 17, we commend to the earnest attention of our readers, and especially those in the Manchester district:—

"The Committee of the Manchester Domestic Mission, of which the Rev. S. A. Steinthal is the chairman, have decided to extend the premises under their charge in Renshaw-street, Hulme, and Willert-street, Collyhurst. The work of the Mission has now been carried on in Manchester for more than seventy years, and during the last few years the number of those who look to it as the centre of their religious, moral, and social life has grown so rapidly that the buildings are no longer equal to the purpose they have to serve. The work of the ministers, that of the Rev. A. W. Timmis, at Renshaw-street, and that of the Rev. J. W. Bishop, at Willert-street, is hampered by want of room for the increasing number of Sunday scholars and for the clubs and classes which meet during the evenings of the week. These clubs provide for the several needs of men, boys, and girls in districts where the opportunities for social life are of the fewest, and there are, in addition, classes in drill, music, and dressmaking, Band of Hope societies, and health and mothers' meetings. Provident banks are at work, and there are lending libraries as well, all being carried on by the ministers, who have the assistance of voluntary workers of many religious denominations.

A sum of £5,500 is needed for the enlargement of the premises and the relief of the financial strain under which the work is carried on. The Committee regard as being necessary for the efficient maintenance of the work of the Mission the extension of the classroom accommodation at Renshaw-street and the enlargement of the chapel at Willert-street. The Society has each year to maintain its work at a cost largely exceeding its regular income, and with a view to obtaining a sounder financial basis the Committee desire to raise a sum which will enable them to defray an existing deficit of about £200, and render unnecessary the incurring of any debt for the next few years at least.

Towards the necessary sum nearly £2,000 has been subscribed. There have been two anonymous gifts, one of £1,000 for the Renshaw-street, and one of £500 for the Willert-street Mission, and more than £50 was obtained by a concert given in the Memorial Hall, by Miss Fillunger, Mr. Max Mayer, Mr. Rawdon Briggs, Mr. Carl Fuchs, and Mr. R. J. Forbes. An appeal has been issued for the remainder of the sum, with the signatures of the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, Mr. G. H. Leigh; Mr. W. J. Hadfield, of Chesham-place, Stamford-road, Bowdon, the treasurer; and the Rev. W. E. George, of 280, Worsley-road, Swinton, the secretary.

It is no use to talk of our fuller light unless we can show brighter and purer lives.—C. J. Perry.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

SIR,—It may be convenient if you will allow me to state here, in reply to Mr. Fox, what I know of the case of Mr. Oliver, as we can hardly go into such details in our meeting. In addition to the scanty entry which students make year by year in a book kept for the purpose, I have nothing to rely upon but my recollections, which, however, are perfectly distinct, and with which Mr. Carpenter's agree. Mr. Oliver was not on the foundation during his first year, because he had not taken his degree. After taking his degree he was placed on the foundation, and received a bursary. The state of his religious opinions was, of course, not described in the Committee's Reports, for at that time no one thought of interfering with the opinions of the students. But, as far as I can recollect, he invariably professed, in conversation, to be a Churchman, and to have come to our College because he differed from some of the current interpretations of Anglican doctrine, and wished to have the benefit of the unfettered teaching and study which we offered. He considered himself to be in fullest sympathy with the ancient Catechetical School of Alexandria, and so took an unusual interest in our studies in Philo. That his Churchmanship continued to the end is impressed upon me by the fact that when I visited him on his death-bed he begged, indeed required, me not to use any prayers but those in the Prayer-book of the Church of England. How often he preached in Nonconformist pulpits I cannot say, as the preaching arrangements were then in the hands of Dr. Martineau; but I have never heard of an authority which can forbid non-subscribing congregations to listen to a young Churchman. I do not think he was entitled to receive a grant from any fund which was limited by its trust to Protestant Dissenters. But I am equally sure that he would not have done anything dishonourable. "The Liberal Dissenters' Endowment Fund" is generally known simply as the "Hackney College Fund," and Mr. Oliver may have quite innocently supposed that it was applicable to any student at the College, for the Trustees, as far as I am aware, do not impose any test. With some peculiarities, he was an interesting and serious student, and listened with earnest attention to our teaching. If he received a little of our money he made in return some contribution of fresh thought and of glimpses into a larger world. Professors and students willingly took a railway journey to pay a last tribute of affection and respect at his grave. It will be strange indeed if, after so many years, we repent of having given a little of our substance to help a pure young soul in its flight to that higher world in which he deeply and devoutly believed.

JAMES DRUMMOND.

Oxford, Nov. 21.

SIR,—Personal considerations, which have no proper place in the settlement of a question of principle, have been imported into this controversy, but they formed no part of the issue challenged by the memorialists. There was no attack, overt or implied, on the Principal or any of the professors, not even upon Mr. Addis's incongruous position as Anglican head of the residence of a "Nonconformist Academy"; for he had taken the right course in withdrawing from conducting service in the College chapel, and the further objection was not to be pressed. The "Explanatory Statement" was in print, ready to be issued as soon as the arrangements for the special meeting were made, and it contained no mention of Mr. Addis. But the professors' letter altered all that, and the fact that Mr. Addis signed it made it impossible to keep silence about the residence. Hence the "Statement" was enlarged by authority of meetings of the memorialists.

I am not aware that anyone has sought to "turn Mr. Addis out." There has been no suggestion as to his resignation of the chair of Old Testament and Hebrew. If he had actually signed the Articles it would have been different. Your leader of 12th inst. admitted (as Dr. Martineau frequently urged) that a teacher in such plight could not be free, and should therefore have no place on the College staff. It is true that, having been a priest in the Catholic Church, Mr. Addis is recognised by the Anglican Church as already in Holy Orders (Dr. Drummond even tells us that a priest's orders "are indelible"). It is true that he has in the newspapers published a defence of the Prayer-book and the Creeds. It is true that he has recently voted in Convocation of Oxford University against freeing examinerships in theology from ecclesiastical and dogmatic tests. But as he has not actually pledged himself by signature he may be able to teach freely.

The headship of the residence is a very different matter. There the students, who are nearly all preparing for a Free Nonconformist ministry, are obliged to reside. There they are now under the constant influence of an Anglican head. It may not be used consciously on behalf of Conformity, but it certainly will not be used in any sense to strengthen the sturdy principle of Nonconformity. The more winning the personality of the head the greater his real influence is bound to be; and all that is said about the charm of Mr. Addis's nature (which I can readily understand) makes the case against his being the Dean of Residence so much the stronger, because he is a living embodiment of that spirit of Conformity against which the College has till recently been a perpetual protest. It is not a question of theology at all, still less of "heresy." It is no question of being Trinitarian or Unitarian. It was well known when Mr. Addis left our church at Nottingham to go to Oxford that he was not a Unitarian. But at the Trustees' meeting, when his appointment was confirmed (I was present at it) no one objected. The situation was altered, however, when later on he went over to the Church, and turned his back on Nonconformity. Even if he held Unitarian views and conformed, as some do, he would disqualify himself for the post of Dean of Residence of a Nonconformist college, if it cared for its Nonconformity at all. But that is just what there seems reason to doubt, judging from the trend of events at the College for the last quarter of a century.

The testimony of the new enthusiast, who seems to have learned much since he became a professor a short time ago, is rather remarkable. It seems that the first and only Anglican teacher of theology at the College is "one of the most truly broadening and elevating influences of which Manchester College has ever enjoyed the benefit"; and "no more valuable influence than his in training our ministers for our churches could possibly be brought to bear both on teacher and taught." Now this is a startling confession of the failure of more than a century, which has known something of the influence of a Wellbeloved, a Kenrick, a Tayler, and a Martineau. The College had to wait until the fulness of time, when a Churchman brought into it a new tone! It is Mr. Jacks who says this, not I. Perhaps there may be some connection between this strange statement of Mr. Jacks and that too true one of Mr. Gow, that the College "does not realise at present the hopes of those who established it at Oxford." And while the principle of perfect freedom is so interpreted as to insist upon the liberty to bind oneself to a creed and to subsidise those who have enslaved themselves, the probabilities are that the distrust of this ultra-freedom, already visible in our churches, will increase, with the natural result that the College will be correspondingly a disappointment. A sturdy Nonconformist does not care to place his son under a Broad Churchman.

Mr. Addis has changed his tone since he thanked me for my frank interview with him. There was no silence on his part then, but very free speech. He told me then, he was glad I thought he had done right in retiring from the services, for his colleagues assured him he had thereby dealt the severest blow at the free principle of the College. The Chairman of the Committee reported to me the same evening that Mr. Addis had expressed his pleasure and satisfaction at the conversation. But that is nearly a year and a half ago, and memories are short. I know nothing of any evening party, and the gentleman to whom Mr. Addis seems at that function to have expressed his unwillingness to conduct the services is not the one to whom I referred. What has been denied was not affirmed in the pamphlet, and what was affirmed can be substantiated.

Mr. Gow informs us that the professors and committee are asking the trustees to leave things exactly as they have been from the beginning. That is just what they are not doing. Within the last 25 years all the innovations have been made. There was no doubt of the Nonconformity of the College then; there is now. There had been no subsidisation of Anglican students then. We are told that there has been one since in the person of Mr. Oliver, and there certainly was an attempt in this direction when the Principal and committee urged Mr. Holden to keep on his exhibition though he meant to conform: Mr. Fox's letter dealing with Mr. Oliver has yet to be answered. No doubt Dr. Drummond knew of Mr. Oliver's avowed intention to enter the Church of England; but the trustees certainly did not know, and they had a right to know. If the committee knew, it is strange that there is nothing in the minutes, any more than in the annual reports, to indicate the fact. But, as Mr. Gow says, this controversy "may teach the committee that they should be in closer touch with the trustees." Even if the raising of false issues at this crisis prevents for a time the affirmation of a principle which is needed to reassure our churches that the College exists primarily to serve them, it will be some gain if the trustees take the direction of affairs into their own hands.

C. J. STREET.

Sheffield, November 22, 1904.

SIR,—I believe that I am the trustee to whom Mr. Addis remarked that Dr. Drummond wished him to continue preaching in the College pulpit. When Mr. Street asked me to write to him my recollections of the conversation, I complied with his request, but added, "this information must not be used except as a point of departure for inquiry." I was willing to do anything in my power to help Mr. Street to learn real facts, and I hoped I had sufficiently guarded against the very thing of which Mr. Addis now justly complains. In frank and friendly conversation one may easily make a statement which is perfectly true, but which, taken by itself, does not convey the whole truth; and it ought never to be cited as testimony until the person uttering it has had an opportunity of saying whether it is a fair and adequate statement of the meaning which he wished to convey. I may add that all along I told Mr. Street that I would be no party to any attack on Mr. Addis, and when the requisition was signed nothing of the sort was intended. I should like also to join with Mr. H. W. Thompson in making it clear that those of the requisitionists who, like ourselves, were unable to attend the meetings, have had nothing to do with the preparation of the pamphlets issued on behalf of the resolution. They are essentially anonymous pamphlets.

It may seem ungrateful after all the light that has been thrown on the subject under discussion to say that there is still a point which remains to me obscure. But those who write for the committee seem to assume that when a man goes over to the Church he first gradually accepts the Church dogmas one by one, and finally accepts the Church itself. I believe the reverse of this process is almost, if not always, true. A man first accepts the Church, and then on the authority of the Church accepts its dogmas. Unquestionably this is so with regard to Roman Catholicism. It would be hard to find an exception in the case of Anglican Catholicism. What, then, I do not understand is how an honourable high-minded man who has finally accepted the Church as his authority for theology can be willing to accept a bursary from the funds of M.C.O., or by what process a committee can persuade him that it would be honourable so to do. It is idle to maintain that there is no difference between these bursaries and the rest of the College expenditure. The College is no poorer if an extra student or two of any religion, or of no religion, attend its classes. No one wishes that this privilege should be curtailed. But when the College pays a student £50 a year out of its funds, its expenditure is increased by precisely this amount. If some of us still think that these bursaries should not be urged on young men who have made up their minds to study for the Church of England, this is not because we are false to the fundamental principles of the College, but because we desire to be loyal to all that is required by this principle of "Free teaching and free learning."

H. SHAEN SOLLY.

Bridport, November 22, 1904.

SIR,—Will you allow me to express my hearty thanks to those members of the College Committee who have just sent to the Trustees a "Further Statement in support of the Committee's Amendment." I have reason to be particularly grateful to them; for the "Further Statement" indicates a rather serious error of mine, of which I have been increasingly aware for some weeks, but which, through dread of admitted inconsistency—that "hobgoblin of little minds," as the great Emerson truly calls it—I have hitherto confessed only to personal friends.

The "Further Statement" says:—

The non-subscription for which Manchester College stands [according to Dr. Sadler's view of the matter] is that which is expressed in the resolution of the Trustees quoted by Prof. Upton, viz., that the professors and students are unpledged to any particular doctrines and opinions. . . . But what is meant by "unpledged"? Surely, in his letter to Rev. C. J. Street, Prof. Upton has refused to recognise a vital distinction, viz., that between one who is actually "pledged," and one who may contemplate the taking of a pledge in the future.

Now, in the face of this charge that I have unwisely lumped together an unessential and a vital matter, I, with my present light, can only cry peccavi; and all I can say in excuse is, that I venture to think that my esteemed colleagues in their letter are chargeable with precisely the same confusion. The granting of bursaries to students and the appointment of conforming professors involve, I now see, essentially different principles. The English Presbyterians who founded the College were large-hearted men. We know that they opened their classes to students of all denominations, and, in some instances at least, without the payment of fees. Hence it appears to me probable they would have been willing (supposing, that is, that they had the means, after providing for their own students) to carry their liberality still further, though there appears to be no clear evidence that they actually did so, and to have given pecuniary aid to some students who at the time of their entrance expressed a preference for the Anglican ministry. There is a most vital difference between the case of a student who says: "My mind is made up; I have a fixed intention to become an Anglican clergyman," and the case of the student who says: "At present I feel a preference for the Anglican ministry, but I should like to place myself freely under the influences of your unsectarian College, and what change those influences may work in me I cannot say." The latter student is unpledged both in fact and in spirit; and as I think that in his case the earlier governors of the College could without violation of their main principle have granted a bursary, so I think that it may well be open to the present Committee to do the same. If such an earnest student, who thus comes to the College with an open mind, should afterwards find that his mind has become wholly closed against further theological change, it may well be assumed that, under such circumstances, he would feel himself impelled, both by inclination and by honour, to seek a more congenial theological habitat.

But it must be distinctly understood that in making such a liberal use of its surplus funds the College would be in no way violating its fundamental principle of unpledged freedom both in the teachers and the taught. The College may do these generous acts; but still remains, like the old English Presbyterians, "so in love with liberty that they objected to any subscription whatever." And this, sir, is, I believe, in perfect accord with what you say in your leader for Nov. 12:—

It appears to us that a clergyman in orders, pledged to the doctrinal articles of the Church of England as the final and dogmatic standard of belief, cannot consistently accept the fundamental principle of the College, or a place among its teachers. Both teachers and taught must be free simply to follow truth.

The Presbyterians who founded the College well knew where to draw the line between liberality and violation of principle. They took it to be a self-evident proposition that their theological teachers should be free from all external subscription to doctrinal articles. I cannot but think that there exists a serious confusion of ideas in the minds of those among us who mix up this vital and essential principle of non-subscription to doctrinal articles with such totally different questions as that of adhesion to particular denominational "isms," and then airily reject the mixture en bloc, as being all equally unessential in the case of the coming professor of theology. To my mind this indiscriminate treatment irresistibly suggests the well-known German saying of "throwing out the baby along with the contents of the bathing-tub." We are told of the portentous mischief which will ensue if the College declines the services of pledged teachers. I quite fail to realise such a peril. Would the College seriously feel the loss of any teacher who could not say, in taking his seat in a philosophical or theological chair, "Whatever I may have subscribed to before, I now come with a perfectly free and open mind to discuss with my pupils these great questions of philosophy and religion"? I have spoken with Hungarian and with Asiatic, and I find they both alike heartily declare themselves in favour of entirely unpledged teachers. Whatever "bogies," then, may haunt the discussion of this great question before the Trustees, they are, I believe, none other than those which have been conjured up by the vivid imagination of some of the most earnest and gifted of your correspondents.

I have read with eager attention Mr. Russell Scott's most interesting letter; but while I quite agree with him in holding that the essential principles of the College may well admit of an occasional departure, now or in the future, from unvaried historical usages, I cannot think that the possible introduction of pledged teachers is one of these allowable departures. My conviction is that the appointment of such teachers to theological or philosophical posts would both violate a principle on which the College is founded, and would sap the sources of its energy and of its future usefulness. Our little Nonconformist Academy has never yet been contented to play the part of passive spectator in the gallant struggle which is gradually rescuing theological thought from the enslaving influence of imposed articles and creeds. Its teachers have constantly mingled in the fray; and whatever may be the issue of the meeting on November 29, I cannot bring myself to believe that our dearly-loved College will ever forego its vital hold on the great principle of theological freedom; or that it will cease to be genuinely non-conformist (in the sense in which the English Presbyterians and Dr. Sadler were non-conformist) till that happy day dawns when the fight for freedom shall have been crowned with victory; and, in the eloquent words of Mr. Russell Scott, "Nonconformity shall have become a meaningless and superfluous term, since the only conformity demanded by Church and University will then be allegiance to the spirit of truth."

CHARLES B. UPTON.

St. George's, Littlemore, November 20.

SIR,—I shall be glad if you will allow me to inform your readers that at the special meeting to be held at Oxford on the 29th, in the event of the Committee's amendment becoming the substantive resolution, the following further amendment will be submitted:—

To omit all after the word "that," and to substitute the following:—

"While no attack has been made from any quarter on 'the original principle of freely imparting theological knowledge without insisting on the adoption of particular doctrines,' and it is therefore unnecessary to re-affirm it, recent incidents have rendered it necessary to declare—

(1) "That it is inexpedient to employ the general funds of the College in affording direct pecuniary assistance to students who do not intend to enter any Protestant Dissenting Ministry; and

(2) "That when Exhibitions are granted to students for the special purpose of enabling them to prepare themselves for some kind of Protestant Dissenting Ministry, it is anomalous and undesirable to insist on their residing in a hostel of which the head is a communicant member of the Church of England."

As I shall have an opportunity of defending this motion at the meeting, I will be as brief as possible now in explaining its object.

I cannot support Mr. Harrison's resolution, because it does not seem to me either legally necessary or expedient to lay down a universal rule of non-subscription for either teachers or students; but this, whether expedient or inexpedient, is a totally different thing from "insisting on the adoption of particular theological doctrines," and the preamble of my amendment is therefore fully justified.

Clause (1) leaves open the question whether the attitude of the committee towards a certain exhibitioner was justified by the special conditions of the Daniel Jones Trust, though personally I do not think it was.

It also leaves open the question of illegality, and claims the support not only of those who, like myself, consider that grants to students preparing for Anglican orders are both intrinsically inexpedient and dangerous by reason of their very doubtful legality, but also of those who may think them inexpedient only because illegal, or legal, but on other grounds inexpedient.

And, lastly, it maintains by implication the distinction which has been scouted as illogical, but which I still hold to be reasonable, between offering direct pecuniary inducement to go through a certain course of training and merely throwing open the class-rooms of the College, with or without fee, to outsiders who do not belong to the category of persons for whom the lectures are primarily intended.

Clause (2) leaves open the question whether active membership of the Church of England ought to disqualify for the post of lecturer on the Old Testament; but it affirms in effect that, inasmuch as the relations between the head of the hostel and the students who are henceforth required to reside in it are apparently intended to be of a much more intimate and pastoral character than those of a mere lecturer to his class, for this post, at all events, sympathy with the main purpose for which the students are there ought to be regarded as indispensable, or only to be dispensed with on the ground of some very exceptional necessity specially pleaded and clearly stated.

The underlying principle of the whole amendment is, that Manchester College has no raison d'etre, unless theology is a progressive science; that in the present state of knowledge honest adhesion to the Anglican (and a fortiori to the Roman Catholic) formularies is an absolute bar to effective pursuit of that science, while dishonest adhesion is to be emphatically discountenanced; consequently, that it is not less, but more, necessary now than at the time when the College was founded, to maintain unimpaired its character as a "Protestant Dissenting" institution.

ROLAND K. WILSON.

Richmond, Nov. 22, 1904.

SIR,—At the Carmarthen Presbyterian College, all the students have their education free without reference to their theological beliefs, but the different denominations support their respective students. The Unitarian student gets nothing from the Congregational funds, and the Congregational student receives no money help from the Unitarian trusts. It seems to me that this is a common sense arrangement, and one worthy of the imitation of Manchester College. Let its class-rooms be open and free to all comers, but let there be no money bribe offered to any man for attending. The freedom of the College can in no way be affected by the giving or the refusing of money to its students. But if you bar any man from teaching a subject of which he is confessedly an authority, then the freedom of the College becomes an empty boast, unless it is proved that the teacher has departed from the lines of pure scholarship. The student should be trained to approach a subject from different sides, if he is to be a healthy influence in active life. This is scarcely possible if all the members of the staff have the same traditions and educational institution behind them. The idea that the Unitarian alone is free is simply an unexploded delusion. The great majority of the fellows and tutors of the Oxford Colleges are laymen, who are debarred by no statute or confession of faith from following and teaching the truth as they see it. They are absolutely unfettered, and they use their freedom as they please. Some are conformists, some nonconformists, some agnostics, some individualists. The same may be said of the Professorate, with perhaps the exception of some of the theological holders. But what Unitarian can teach Prof. Cheyne freedom? Manchester College was moved to Oxford to teach the University freedom, but if we are not careful we shall have to learn from Oxford what free teaching is. When all the members of the tutorial staff at Manchester College are filled by men conspicuous for their scholarship, but belonging to all the denominations or to no denomination, then we may boast that we have set an example of freedom in theological appointments which may be compared with those already prevailing in every other department of learning at Oxford. That is the one lesson that we can teach to Oxford, but apparently have first to learn ourselves from Harvard University. Manchester College wants nothing so much as men like Mr. Addis—men with a fervent living faith, but who are genuine scholars. The true scholar will not allow his theology to mar his scholarship. Witness M. Loriy. The scholar's conscience is as keen and assertive as the theologian's. The sciences of archæology and comparative religion have changed the attitude of scholars towards the Bible. The old habit of forcing the sacred text to square with our own idiosyncrasies is a thing of the past. Faith and dogmas live in water-tight compartments of their own, untouched by scholarship and reason. Early teaching, temperament, and life-long association count for more than all else in matters of belief with most people. Teach a child that Friday is unlucky, and he will die in that faith, though he may reason himself out of it and teach others that it is all nonsense. Huxley retained to the end of his life a prejudice in favour of the luck of the 'thrown slipper." This blind feeling is in the blood of all, and should teach us to be slow to judge others. A conformist may outgrow all the dogmas of his Church, and yet find his chief solace at the old shrine. There is no reason whatever why a conformist, and a wholehearted believer like Mr. Addis, should not be as open-minded as the most advanced or retrograde of the "forty-five." It is far better for the student to be taught by a first-class conformist than by a third-class non-conformist. To those living at a distance from Oxford, or who are unacquainted with Mr. Addis's happy influence over the students, I would urge the utmost caution. He is an old Oxford man. He knows the place and its ways well, and he has the knack of moving among his students as one of themselves, and yet of inspiring that respect which governs by consent. I make this plea, not in behalf or Mr. Addis, but for the good of the College,

J. GWENOGVRYN EVANS.

Pwllheli, Nov. 8.

SIR,—Will you allow me through the columns of your paper to deny publicly a persistent rumour that is in circulation about myself, that I either have or am going to take Orders in the Church? How such a report can have arisen I am at a loss to know, as I have been and still am minister of Park-street Church (Unitarian), Hull, since leaving college. May I, then, say most emphatically that I have never sought to enter the ministry of the Church of England, nor could I as long as creed tests are imposed which I am unable to believe.

I should not have troubled you to make this denial were I alone concerned, but it is because my name is being used in this present agitation against Mr. Addis, at Manchester College, as the horrible example of his priestly (?) influence in driving our young men into the Church of England, that I deem it a duty to contradict this unfounded rumour.

Nov. 22. F. HEMING VAUGHAN.

SIR,—As one of the requisionists for a meeting of Manchester College Trustees, I signed in order to raise some discussion on mangement. I think that your columns bear witness to the advantage of it, and no doubt the meeting will carry it further. It is a pity that the personal element has been imported. I trust that the chairman will see that no resolution is put to the vote which would alter or set aside the central principle on which the College is founded, viz., the absolute liberty of the individual conscience as an authority. I have every confidence that the Unitarian element that stands for the unity of the Father and the brotherhood of men will prevail against any narrow conventionalism.

Your correspondent from Wellington, N.Z., in your last issue, finds no State Church to dissent from or protest against. Perhaps England may yet learn something from her Colonial children. I never expected that the atmosphere of Oxford was well suited for a progressive institution.

STEPHEN S. TAYLER.

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me to point out three misprints in the "Further Statement" in support of the Committee's Amendment dated Nov. 17, recently issued to the Trustees. On page 10 (eleventh line from the bottom) "surviving trustees" should be "moving trustees," and in the first line on page 15 the same misprint occurs. On page 15 line 8 "others" should read "these."

A. H. WORTHINGTON.

THE HUNGARIAN UNITARIAN CHURCH.

SIR,—May I make a remark or two on what Mr. Lloyd Thomas says in his letter on page 731 of THE INQUIRER, relating to Hungary? He says: "Bishop of the State-established Confessional Unitarian Church of Hungary." "Bishop" in Hungary, if the word relates to the ecclesiastical head of a Protestant church, never means more than "superintendent." All the Protestant bishops were designated by this name up to 1848. Since then their equality with the Catholic bishops before the law is expressed by the use of the word "bishop" for them also. "State-established" cannot be said of our Church in the English sense of the word. Perhaps the fact would be best expressed if we said "State-acknowledged," because in historical succession, when the following of a new faith increased to a considerable number and began to have influential leaders the legislative body of the State declared by an Act that this or that religion (and not church) is recognised as one and equal with the other religions in all rights (e.g., to build churches, schools, baptize, &c., and send the bishop to Parliament). Not long ago the Jewish Church was so recognised. No confession was ever required from any of these churches. All of them were formed and sustained on the principle of religious liberty. At one time the State Congress wanted to know what Confession the Unitarians had, in order to see whether they were Christians or not, but never since then have they been forced to sign that Confession, and in the time of Catholic reaction they actually referred to a quite different Confession as their own.

From these remarks it may be seen and judged how far the other words of the writer are applicable to the Hungarian Unitarian Church.

SCHOOL ANNIVERSARY HYMN.

NOVEMBER 20, 1904.

GRATEFUL hearts and songs of praise
Let us all in tribute raise,
For the love we learned to know
In the days of long ago;
For the love that day by day
Led us gently on our way—
Love of parent, teacher, friend,
And the Love that hath no end.

Ah, what beauty we have seen—
Flowers, and fruits, and grasses green,
Sun and moon, and starlit skies,
And the light of loving eyes!
Ah, what wonders we have heard
Of the great in deed and word,
Souls that, clad with grace divine,
Bright as stars for ever shine!

All from thee, Lord, all from thee—
Glorious things to hear and see,
Sweetest memories of the past,
Dearest hopes while life shall last!
So to thee our hearts we give
All our days in love to live;
Keep us, Lord of great and small,
Parent, Teacher, Friend of all.

THE DUTCH UNIVERSITIES BILL.

FOR some twenty-five years Holland was able to boast of being a country where the freedom of scientific research and of liberal teaching was more completely guaranteed than in some other countries. But now the power of reaction is raging and severe attacks are made on the Education Laws. The Universities and the Public Schools for elementary education will have a hard fight in the coming years. Especially the so-called Public Lower Schools (for children) seem to be in a dangerous position.

In Holland the Universities do not have private possessions. They are State Universities, without the right of self-government. The Dutch Constitution prescribes that all citizens shall have equal rights. So it is impossible that the State Universities should be schools for the education of the members of any particular denomination. Nevertheless, this actually was the case formerly in matters of Theology. Up to 1876 the Theological faculties were the Seminaries of the Dutch Reformed Church, which only ceased to be the State Church at the beginning of the nineteenth century. The Liberal Government of 1876 did away with this survival, and established a new Faculty of Theology of quite independent character. Like the other University professors, the theological professors were to be appointed by the King, and they might be taken from any denomination. The duty of these professors was to teach the literary, historical, and philosophical branches of theological science. To the various churches was also given the right of appointing special professors for the teaching of dogmatics, the history of these churches, and pastoral theology. So, for instance, the present Faculty of Theology at Leiden consists of five professors, of whom two belong to the liberals in the Dutch Reformed Church, one to the orthodox party in that church, one (being Norwegian) to the Norwegian Lutheran Church, and one (Professor Lake) to the English Established Church. Two church professors of the Dutch Reformed Church, and one of the Remonstrants, are attached to the Faculty. This state of things made it possible to teach Old and New Testament from a perfectly free standpoint. Liberals and moderate orthodox have been well content with this condition. I know that the orthodox members of the Faculties at Utrecht and Groningen enjoy their freedom and appreciate it. But the old Calvinists have never been reconciled to it. They have felt that independent theological study means the death of old Calvinism, and they did not like their students to be educated at the State Universities.

So their leader, Mr. A. Kuyper, founded, in 1881, a so-called Free University at Amsterdam. It had to pay its own expenses, and, as a matter of fact, was a private higher school of pure Calvinistic character, with some four or five professors in all, for the teaching of theology, classics, and law. The school soon proved to be of a very narrow-minded character, as its professor of law, the eminent statesman, Dr. A. T. de Savornin Lohman, was dismissed by the Board for lack of pure Calvinistic sense.

The degrees given by this school could not be acknowledged by the State, the school being not a complete University with five Faculties as required by the Education Law, and being of a perfectly private character. From the beginning, however, Dr. Kuyper asked for his school this acknowledgment, the so-called effectus civilis. Some of the doctor degrees of the State Universities give the right of being appointed as a teacher, a lawyer, or a magistrate. Dr. Kuyper wanted this privilege for his school. It could only be granted by revision of the law, and the Liberal Government would not think of such a revision, merely for the sake of Dr. Kuyper's school, with its wholly uncontrolled teaching.

But things changed when the plain minister of religion, Dr. Kuyper, of 1881, became Her Majesty's Prime Minister of 1901. In that year the attack of the combined clerical parties, Roman Catholic, Calvinist, and Dutch Reformed Orthodox, at last succeeded. Very soon the clerical government made the Universities feel the hand of Pharaoh. Last year a Bill was brought in, partially revising the Education Law, and, more recently, a new Bill revising the Elementary Education Law.

The University Bill contained three main points. (1) Private societies should have the right of appointing special professors in the State Universities, if the societies were found to possess about £8,000. (2) Private societies should have the right of founding Universities of at least three faculties and nine professors. These private Universities were to be controlled by a State Commission, except in the theological faculty, which should be free from any control as to its teaching, the scientific degree of its professors and their abilities. Nevertheless, the theological faculty should have the right of giving the doctor degree, and of voting in the senate of the private University. (3) These private Universities would possess the effectus civilis, Besides this the State should pay fl.100,000 to the Free University of Dr. Kuyper.

Among the Liberals there was great opposition to the second and third points. A good many of them were willing to accept point 1. The clerical majority of the Second Chamber voted the Bill, but it was rejected by the Liberal majority of the First Chamber. Immediately after this decision the First Chamber was dissolved by the Government. The new elections of the members of the Provincial States were in favour of the Government, and as the First Chamber is elected by the Provincial States, the Government now has a majority in the First Chamber also.

The University Bill was again brought into the Second Chamber on Nov. 13, and we may expect that it will very soon become law. Thus we shall have to face the struggle for truth as a political struggle, with all the drawbacks of that.

Leiden. B. D. EERDMANS.

IT is not enough to use words conveying truth. Truth must be so given that the mind will lay hold on, will recognise it as truth, and will incorporate it with itself.—Channing.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

GADARENE SWINE.

JESUS had been preaching by the shore of the Sea of Galilee to a great multitude of people; and you may read what he is reported to have said in the fourth chapter of Mark. When evening came he sent the people away, and embarked on board a boat with his disciples in order to cross the lake and land in the country of the Gadarenes. Some of the people went with him in smaller boats. A storm of wind sprang up so that they had a very rough passage; but they reached the other side safely.

Immediately Jesus came out of the boat there met him a wild-looking man who was crazy. He lived among the tombs, and was so stark mad that he wore no clothes. His friends had tried to chain him up, as they do lunatics to-day in some countries; but when they bound him with fetters he broke them and made his escape to the mountains and the tombs, where night and day he set up a horrible yelling, cutting his naked body with stones, and making quite a ghastly picture of himself. He could not be tamed.

The story says that when this man saw Jesus he ran and worshipped him, and begged on his knees that he would not torment him. Jesus had a wonderful power of soothing troubled minds, and of suppressing bad instincts in others, and he saw at once that this poor man was possessed by quite a legion of devils or unclean spirits. So he commanded them to come out of him, and then, we are told, they entered a great herd of swine, about two thousand, which in turn became mad, and, rushing violently down a cliff into the sea, were drowned. The maniac, however, was in his right mind again, and dressed himself in his clothes, and behaved decently and soberly as a sensible man should.

I do not want you to take all this as literally true, any more than I should if I were relating to you one of Æsop's fables, which tells us what the donkey said to the dog or the wolf to the lamb, for donkeys and wolves do not talk, nor can evil spirits be driven out of men into pigs. The lesson of the fable is this:—The poor maniac had a number of bad qualities which bemeaned and degraded him. They made him passionate, defiant of ordinary rules of behaviour, uncouth, and even hurtful to himself. In fact, they were not fit for human beings; they were only suitable for pigs, and self-destructive even for them.

Beware then, of those characteristics which might render you piggish, and rob you of the dignity which, as human beings, ought to make you lovable and gracious. We are all of us animals, of course, but man ought to be the paragon of animals, and have all that tends to rank growth in his nature under restraint and control. While we pity this deluded maniac of the story, let us be careful lest we, too, have some of the evil spirits which made him so wretched an object.

In the sense in which the word "devil" is used it means "passion," "bad motive," "greed," "sinfulness," "untruthfulness," "discontent," "laziness," "uncleanness," "fretfulness," &c. In fact, these "devils" are legion. I have sometimes heard tiresome children called "little pigs," and I think it must be because they have had some of these evil possessions. There are men and women whose characters and conduct make us think of pigs. God has created them beautiful, and bestowed upon them gifts and graces, and yet they disregard His purpose, and instead of living the life of the Spirit, they feed their fleshly lusts. Sometimes I see children laugh at a drunken man reeling along the street, with his hat battered in, his coat muddy, and his face betokening a gross stupidity. Such a sight is one of the most lamentable that innocent children can behold, and it should make you shudder with abhorrence. Gluttony and intemperance bring human beings down to the level of grovelling swine sooner than anything else, and should be most carefully avoided. God created children, and endowed them with really wonderful powers in order that they might grow up into men and women with characters made beautiful by virtuous conduct and unselfish deed and truthful speech.

Every child knows what is meant when it is said that so-and-so is "pig-headed." It means that he is stubborn, will not be advised, is foolishly grounded in his own conceit, is not moved by argument. It is so easy for children to become "piggish" in this respect, for they will not always take the advice of their elders; sometimes they are disobedient to their parents and teachers, or are headstrong and think they know everything, and even become positively rude in their speech and manner towards those whom they ought to revere. Such children have some of the evil spirits that haunted the poor maniac of Gadara.

Try not to lose your temper, because when you are angry you are likely to say and do very wrong things which afterwards you may be ashamed of. Besides, bad temper makes you ugly with frowns so that nobody can really like you; and it worries father and mother more than I can tell.

Always speak the truth. It may be easy to tell falsehoods, but it is very ignoble. Never take what is not yours. There are men without arms and men without legs; but the man who has lost his character through lying or dishonesty is a hundred times worse off than they. He has lost the respect of his fellows, and has offended God.

Express thankfulness for what you receive; not only those things which your parents directly provide, but learn to thank God for the privilege of breathing, of seeing all the beauties of nature, and of hearing all her song, and of feeling yourself growing in strength and knowledge. It is a great privilege to live, and life should be a continual thanksgiving. Avoid habits of laziness. God gave you hands for a purpose, and a brain to direct those hands to good and useful work.

Finally, keep well in mind the story of the poor Gadarene maniac, and have nothing to do with those evil habits and motives and passions which change human beings as it were into pigs, and which give displeasure to the God who made you.

THE COLLEGE CONTROVERSY.

WHAT the issue may be of the special meeting of the Trustees of Manchester College, to be held at Oxford on Tuesday next, we do not venture to forecast. What is most earnestly to be hoped is that heats of temper, in a controversy which threatens to become acute, may not be allowed to confuse any issue, or lead to action which will be bitterly repented in after years. When friends cannot at once see eye to eye with one another, or agree on any matter in which both sides feel a vital principle to be involved, they do not fall out among themselves and go to law, they silence all special pleading and set themselves to a more thorough and earnest investigation of the facts, that light from every side may be thrown upon the problem, and then, in the strength of unbroken friendship, see whether fuller knowledge and deepened sympathy with the others' point of view cannot lead to a common judgment of what is right.

Even supposing Tuesday's meeting, after the manifold discussions which have preceded it, does not bring out with perfect clearness the fundamental principle of the College and the right policy to be pursued in its management, and there should still be doubts and misgivings unsatisfied, we refuse to contemplate an issue so disastrous and ignoble as public litigation. We have in the circle of our friends distinguished lawyers, familiar with the history and traditions of our religious community, and trusted laymen of the truest wisdom, who surely would be willing, if it should prove necessary, to undertake an exhaustive examination of the history both of the foundation and of the management of the College from the beginning, and could then set the case in such a light that all reasonable minds would be convinced.

We do not propose here to enter into the discussion which in our present issue Mr. STREET carries on with so much vigour from his point of view. We have already stated our conviction that the College was established as a public institution, the benefits of which, while designated in the first place for a very special service, were not to be confined to any sect or parly; and it appears to us that the position both as to the practical purpose of the College in the service of our Free Churches and as to the lofty ideal of its founders, which we must still maintain, was most admirably stated by Mr. RUSSELL SCOTT in his letter last week. The question of bursaries for the support of students preparing for the ministry may need reconsideration in the light of present-day conditions, not as a matter of principle, but of practical administration as between college and churches, and here the suggestion of Mr. GWENOGVRYN EVANS's letter may prove helpful. But that there is anything contrary to the open principle of the College in allowing full benefits to capable and worthy students for the ministry, who desire to be trained in its free atmosphere, even though they have themselves determined that they ought to serve in a conformist Church, we cannot for a moment admit; and as to the specific case of which so much has been made, Dr. DRUMMOND'S vindication in his letter to the Trustees, concluding with the passage which we quoted at the end of our leader last week, appears to us unanswerable, not only in its generosity, but in its justice and far-seeing wisdom.

With regard to the position of Mr. ADDIS, as head of the Residence, in view of what has been said in criticism, we desire simply to give prominence to Dr. DRUMMOND'S assurance that he is "absolutely loyal to the open principle of the College," and to add this further passage from Dr. DRUMMOND'S letter to the Trustees:—

"Mr. ADDIS is far above any testimonial from me, but he may not be equally well known to all our Trustees; and I must allow myself the pleasure of saying that on any theological questions involving largeness of outlook, breadth of sympathy, and kind and candid consideration, there are few men whom I would rather consult. When I add that he is a man of large and accurate scholarship, of wide experience, of whole-hearted devotion to the interests of the College, and of unbounded kindness in giving time and labour to the students, I think you will feel that he is a man whom we ought to regard, not with suspicion, but with honour; and if you drive such a man to resign, either by a direct or an indirect attack, you will simply cover the College with disgrace. But I cannot believe that such a calamity is at hand."

It will be understood that only Trustees can be admitted to Tuesday's meeting, of which we shall publish a report as complete as possible next week.

FOR UNION OR DISUNION?

IT is greatly to be feared that we are about to experience evil effects of the agitation for the reversal of our fiscal policy of a kind certainly foreseen by leading opponents of the movement, but to which all too little attention has been given hitherto during the progress of the controversy. There has very properly been much speaking and writing of the damage to our national prosperity which the re-establishment of Protection in the Mother Country would involve. We have heard much also of the wrong done to Colonial loyalty to the Imperial tie, by the suggestion that that loyalty will be weakened unless it is bought by the concession of fiscal advantages over other countries in our home markets. What has been less clearly realised, except by a few, is the danger that the reiteration of the fiction that we owe such a concession as a debt should create a demand for it in the Colonies just at the time when the suggestion is being finally rejected by the people of the Mother Country. Before the commencement of the agitation the idea of such preferential treatment had occurred to only a few men in the Colonies, and was purely academic in character. The rest of our colonists were well content with the complete freedom we gave them in our ports side by side with the foreigner. The suggestion that we should change our method has been rejected by home opinion, but there are signs that it has inspired a section at least of Colonial opinion with the idea that something more may be had for the asking, and that that something more is well worth asking for. Moreover, those who have charge of the agitation at home appear quite unconscious of the danger to Imperial unity involved in their stimulation of this new idea in the Colonies, while yet public opinion at home remains steadfastly hostile to a change.

The story is only one more illustration of the demoralising effect produced in every direction by the Protectionist campaign wherever it obtains a modicum of success. There are, no doubt, many well meaning people, with nothing to gain personally by the change, who sincerely believe that a return to a Protectionist system, veiled or avowed, would really be for the benefit of the nation and the Empire. But the real weight of support to the Protectionist propaganda comes from those who expect personal pecuniary gain from it. In some the motive is conscious, in some unconscious; in some the benefit is expected to be general as well as personal, in some concern is concentrated wholly on the prospect of personal gain, to the complete exclusion of all concern as to its effect on the interests of others. It is this selfish, anti-social interest, forming the backbone of the Protectionist movement, which renders inevitable interminable bickerings between conflicting interests if once the old policy regains the upper hand. Already in the Colonies signs are growing of the dissensions that would break out there over the preference scheme, were it ever to reach the stage of actual negotiation.

The Colonial farmer thinks that it would be a fine thing to get a preference in the home market for his corn, his mutton, or his wool. The Colonial manufacturer, however, is by no means so willing to grant the free admission to the Colonies of the manufactured articles of the Mother Country which we should be bound to ask for in return. The moment real negotiations began, therefore, these two sections of Colonial industry would find themselves hopelessly at loggerheads. Similar difficulties have long been apparrent at home. Some English manufacturers would welcome a tax on foreign manufactures, but they are opposed to a tax upon food and other raw materials of their industries. The English farmer, while he may shortsightedly acquiesce in a tax on manufactures, is mainly desirous of a good stiff tax on foodstuffs other than fodder. He will welcome the exclusion of the foreigner as a first step, but he will certainly not allow his Imperial sentiment to stand in the way of a demand, when once that has been conceded, for the completion of the protective barrier at the expense of Colonial foodstuffs also.

The new "reform" movement has, in fact, set clamouring a mass of essentially selfish interests possessed of no sort of homogeneity, and affording no evidence of being inspired by any of the Imperialistic ideals of the founders of the movement, though cheerfully willing to make use of those ideals so far as, and so long as, these subserve their purely selfish ends. This mass of selfishly Protectionist sentiment has doubtless always existed in spite of the triumph of Free Trade doctrines in the middle of last century. But the apparent hopelessness of persuading the electorate into any reversal of that victory has kept them more or less quiescent till now. The new campaign in favour of preferences has re-awakened hope. But though the leaders of the movement talk of preferences for the sake of Imperial unity, the desire of the interests is now, as ever, for all round Protection, preferences or retaliation being merely their half-way house,

Thus those who believe themselves to be leading a movement in favour of closer union are, in fact, awaking into fresh life forces making wholly in the direction of disintegration. Were they to succeed for the moment in securing the imposition of taxes excluding the foreigner, but still admitting the Colonial to our markets, the very forces which had proved powerful enough to secure them their victory would inevitably march on to the exclusion of the Colonials as well. On the other hand, if, as will in fact be the case, they are finally defeated in their efforts to secure preferences, the controversy will have left a sense of soreness and disappointment among Colonials who had hoped to gain by them, and a sense of discontent with the policy of the Mother Country practically non-existent while our Free Trade policy remained unchallenged at home. The essential tragedy of the present situation lies in the fact that the very men who are working their hardest in the advocacy of fiscal change in the hope of promoting closer union are, in fact, by their very action, successful or unsuccessful in its immediate aims, making only for bickering and disunion. They have been playing with fire—have unconsciously been playing the part of incendiaries. They have awaked from its slumbers a vast anti-social force which may and will be beaten down again, but which will work, and has worked, sad havoc in the course of its brief return to life.

THE London County Council has issued the necessary advertisement of its Bill for preserving the London squares as open spaces in perpetuity. It has been obliged, in order to comply with Parliamentary standing orders, to insert a list of all the squares to which the Bill relates, and this enormously long schedule is a striking document. We all know the districts where the squares are most numerous: we see here how widely spread they are, in every quarter of the town, so that the square is almost as characteristic of London as the boulevard of a foreign city. Attention was called some months ago, in these columns, to the dangers of these squares being built over: a few, indeed, have been covered with houses. We welcome this attempt to prevent the mischief going any further, and there should be little doubt of the Bill being carried into law. The squares are never to be built upon, unless on condition of other land equal in area being given as an open space in exchange. In return, the squares are to be exempt from any future taxation by way of a rate on site values. The Bill also enables agreements to be come to between the owners and the Council whereby the latter body shall assume the management and the expense of the enclosures as open spaces.

UNITARIANISM FOR TO-DAY.

BY THE REV. BURT ESTES HOWARD, M.A., PH.D.*

IN accepting the courteous invitation to say a few words to the London District Unitarian Society at its Autumn meeting, I have had no remotest thought of being able to contribute any new idea, or to add anything to that stream of enlightenment which is flowing from your own pulpits. In the moment or two at my disposal, therefore, I shall endeavour merely to answer a single question which, on both sides of the Atlantic and wherever Unitarianism has found a foothold, is forcing its way into our thinking and is demanding recognition.

The present age is characterised by a steady movement away from old faiths and forms in all departments of thought and life. Whether such a movement is wholesome or harmful depends on the thoroughness with which it is carried out, and on the purpose behind it all. But whether for good or evil "the thoughts of men are widened with the process of the suns." There is no stopping the onward march of things. It may be guided. It cannot be arrested.

This unfolding of the human mind, this freeing of the human spirit, starts a question which goes to the very roots of Unitarianism. For Unitarianism itself cannot escape the rigid application of those criteria which it has demanded as tests and norms in its religious thinking. With all the other human institutions, which struggle for a place in the world must Unitarianism also appear at the bar of public opinion to justify its right to be. For Unitarianism, as well as for all other "isms," this is a day of judgment. There is no escape, no nolle prosequi—and there should be none. For Unitarianism has no more right to cumber the earth than any other "ism." It must answer to the very spirit which it has itself conjured up from earth and heaven.

The question, then, that fronts us is this: In view of the general advance in liberal thought, an advance which is by no means measured by the census of professedly liberal churches, has not Unitarianism become superfluous? Has it not fulfilled its function, and, in so doing, lost its raison d'être?

To answer this question we must ask another: What is Unitarianism? For, whether Unitarianism has outlived its usefulness depends on what it is in the essence of it. What does Unitarianism stand for? What ought it to stand for? Is it a mere protest against antiquated forms of faith? Is it a mere negation of certain dogmas that have ruled the religious world? If this is the core of Unitarianism, it is evident that when the protest is effective, when the contested dogmas cease to dominate the thought of the world, the mission of Unitarianism is surely done.

Unitarianism has opposed steadfastly and consistently the impossible metaphysic and mathematic of the Trinitarian school. It has stood resolutely against the multitude of things in the so-called orthodox creeds which no logical mind could believe, because incredible, and against the large number of things which, though credible, no sane man ought to believe. In this it has rendered the world good service.

But this is not the goal of Unitarianism. Not to this end was it born, nor for this purpose came it into the world. Unitarianism is not exhausted in remonstrance. Its work is not accomplished in dogmatic protest and denial. If Unitarianism is a mere debating society, if it can set forth no claim for a place in the sun except a string of syllogisms and a volume or two of argument, it can scarcely justify its existence in a world of practical men. With the spread of a liberal spirit it becomes a sort of ecclesiastical Don Quixote, a fighter of theological windmills. It is not worth while.

Unitarianism has a right to live, not as the negation of an outworn metaphysic, but as the exemplification of a positive and practical ethic. To combat the old creeds is the least of its tasks. To criticise by creation, to demonstrate, in its own pure, high living, the celestial possibility of divine manhood, this is its holy mission. It is a great thing to fight a good fight, but it is not enough. We must keep the faith. There is no particular virtue in moral emptiness. There must be a positive residuum of spiritual truth at the heart of our movement after eliminating the unessential and incredible; there must be a great taproot of moral affirmation, else we degenerate into a species of hypocrisy and moral impotence worse than that against which we have revolted. We become like Ahimaaz, who, eager to run, reached the king first of the messengers, but, when he arrived, he had no message.

Every movement toward liberty carries a danger at the heart of it—a danger of self-destruction. From this danger the movement towards religious liberty cannot escape. In seeking to free men from the trammels of old and insufficient creeds the religious Protestant runs a grave risk of breeding a disregard of all moral and spiritual standards and restraints. If Unitarianism is willing to assume the risk, she dare not, if honest, avoid the responsibility that goes with it. She must become a positive factor in the religious life of the world, a power that makes for righteousness. Negation must be only incident to affirmation, destruction the condition to construction. If she takes away it must be in order to give more.

The world has no need of a new church, but it does need a new spirit, a quickening spirit in the heart of the old. It is life the world is scant of; we have logic enough. It is prophets the age cries out for; we have too many preachers. Our times are paralysed with the creeping palsy of ecclesiasticism, of organised, canting hypocrisy and greed concealing its moral poverty and spiritual nakedness behind the machinery of State support; damming up the water of life, to dribble it out through the fingers of a hierarchy of lay figures, and cursing those who seek to dig springs for themselves outside the sacred enclosure of this religious monopoly, this ecclesiastical trust. The streets are full of little ecclesiastics who scuttle like rabbits down their creda holes at the approach of a new idea, or back, crawfish-like, under the establishment at the slightest indication of a moral enthusiasm.

The call of to-day is for a dynamic religion—a religion that is not content with the conventionalities of a dilettante worship, or with the puerilities of ecclesiastical propriety. Worship? What is worship but work in the spirit of God for the service of man?

There is room in the earth for a church with a great moral glow at the heart of it; for a church that fronts the problems that harry the world with steady, resolute eyes, and regards nothing human as alien to it; a church exemplifying a religion that is not too dainty to walk the dusty highways of life, nor too delicate to be planted in the heart of the world, where the clerical struggle against wretchedness and wrong and sin is going on.

Here is an opportunity worthy of a God! Is Unitarianism great enough in soul and mighty enough in courage for this thing? The world is heartily sick, and properly sick, of this pampered playing at religion that constitutes so large a part of modern ecclesiasticism; this miserable dawdling along the great highways of life, this everlasting preparing for service that issues in no fruitful activity, this monotonous dress parade, with no fighting under the King's banner.

There is a cry ringing out on the air for a church great enough in faith to forget its own reputation, mighty enough in its belief in the victory of righteousness to give itself with a supreme passion to the realisation of righteousness in the social and civic life of the world. That would be a church worth the devotion and the energy of men! It would utter itself in no dogmatic formulas to trick and trap the thought of men. It would exhaust itself in no religious mummery, in no useless and silly parading of ecclesiastical millinery. It would stand for that human solidarity which is the very heart of Christianity because it is the very core of humanity, for unity of spirit, for that oneness of the divine and human which is the keystone of religion—of any religion worth a man's while.

Unity of spirit, unity of consecration to the best we know, unity of action in realising that best in ourselves and in the world about us—that were a Unitarianism whose summons would send the warm blood tingling through a man's veins and make religion something more than a meaningless phrase, or a selfish scramble for spiritual spoils. It stands at the cross-roads when the work-a-day life of the world is lived; it grips the problems that fret the bodies and souls of men; it pushes into the tangled thicket of greed and selfishness and sin, organises the public conscience, and clears a broad place where the least of us may get a man's chance at living a clean, wholesome life.

If Unitarianism is willing to do this thing, if it is willing to try to do this thing; to stand forth as a tangible positive power making for righteousness; if it has something to offer men besides its mere husks of doubt, something that can be wrought into a fibrous, white-souled manhood and womanhood, then it needs no apologetic for its existence and no justification for its activity. But there is no room in God Almighty's world in these days, for Unitarianism or any other "ism" as an intellectual cult, a religious fad, a mere ecclesiastical mechanism.

Here is the opportunity of Unitarianism. Free as the air, shackled by no benumbing and belittling conventions, if the Unitarian Church will accept the high ideal of a religion that is more careful for life than for logic, more eager to save men than to preserve its mannerisms, it will be hailed with joy by the troubled children of earth and become as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land.

And men will believe in such a church. "Give me a hundred men," said a great preacher in my own land, "give me a hundred men—not men who are ecstatic when they pray and glowing when they sing, but men whose daily life is a benediction and whose deeds will stand the sunlight—give me a hundred such men, and I will bind them into a book with which I shall make the world believe!" And when a church shall come forth and take its place among the people, with a redemptive spirit burning in its heart—not to redeem men out of this life into an impossible and insipid heaven, but to create a world that is true, and righteous, and just, then will the men of the world crowd to its threshold and cry: "Now we believe, not because of thy speaking, but because we have seen with our eyes and know that this is a church of the living God."

A PROTESTANT DISSENTERS' CHAPEL.

IV.

ROTHWELL'S SUCCESSORS.

THE history of the congregation meeting in Holcombe Chapel after Rothwell's death is a singular one. For a time it followed the course of neighbouring Lancashire Dissenting congregations under a succession of short pastorates; then it became markedly Independent, and was affiliated with the Lancashire Congregational Union, then it was switched off on to Scottish Presbyterian lines; then it was deprived of the new church building put up for it by a benefactor, and saw that building transferred to the Church of England; and, finally, after some litigation, and a successful effort to put up yet another church building, it settles down in connection with the Presbyterian Church of England.

While the younger congregation at Bury grew that at Holcombe languished, and experienced many of the difficulties incidental to a country church in the latter part of the eighteenth century. There was difficulty in raising enough to pay a minister. For the list of Rothwell's successors we must refer the reader to Nightingale's "Lancashire Nonconformity," and Elliot's "Country and Church of the Cheeryble Brothers," being here content with mentioning one or two of the number. Peter Walkden was here from 1738 to 1744, a man of genial humour as we gather from his diary. He had previously held the joint pastorate of Hesketh Lane and Newton-in-Bowland. Then come the names of Halliday and Aspinall. There are indications that Holcombe was subsequently worked jointly with other places, such as Blackley or Walmsley. Thus the Rev. John Helme, while minister of Blackley Chapel from 1755 to 1757, is referred to as of Holcombe. This is confirmed by a deed of surrender of Holcombe Chapel, dated October 18, 1755, which speaks of "All that one building . . . . consisting of four bays adjoining to Nuttall-lane, formerly called Little Edmunds . . . . now in the possession or occupation of John Helm, clerk, or his assigns."

After Helme a Mr. Valentine ministered here, and he was followed by a Mr. Taylor. If this was the Rev. Henry Taylor, then the trend in the Independent direction was becoming more apparent. He began his ministerial work as a Methodist, but gave up Arminianism, and became a Calvinist. We are told that he "professed himself for some time to be an Independent, and served the congregation in Holcombe-lane." By 1782 a manse had been built on to the end of the chapel, for in a deed of that year relating to the chapel there is a reference to "an house for the use and benefit of the minister thereof for the time being." A part of the meeting house itself was also partitioned off, at the opposite end to the manse, and was let as a dwelling house.

The Independent Period.

When the Rev. Benjamin Holmes arrived in 1796 the building was in "a ruinous condition," and there was but "a small handful of people." Holmes stirred matters up. He was an Independent. But he did not stay long; he crossed over to the hills on the opposite side of the valley, and opened in 1798 a new place called Park Chapel. He seems to have desired to absorb the old congregation, and carry all the members to the new and more convenient site, but some clung to the old spot. There was evidently an element in the congregation not quite in sympathy with Mr. Holmes, possibly of a liberal or Arian type, for the "Evangelical Magazine," speaking of Holcombe Chapel before Mr. Holmes's time, says, "the gospel was either not faithfully preached in it, or but little blest," and we know how to interpret such a sentence from such a source.

In 1806 the Rev. Peter Ramsay settled at Holcombe. He had studied under that active Congregational minister, the Rev. W. Roby, of Manchester. A period of renewed prosperity ensued; the Grant Brothers, prototypes of Dickens' Cheeryble Brothers, coming at this time from Scotland, settled in the valley, and quickly won their way to fortune. They attached themselves to Holcombe Chapel. They helped it, but they also sought to rule it. The Lancashire Congregational Union was formed in 1806, and Holcombe with Mr. Ramsay was one of the first churches to join it, and during his ministry his church sent annual collections to the Union funds, and, as the Holcombe Independent Chapel, contributed to the Manchester Infirmary. In 1808 a petition was issued for funds to alter and renovate the chapel, and the place was entirely rebuilt, though much on the old lines, mainly at the expense of the Grants.

Soon after this Mr. Ramsay had to leave. He was ejected from the chapel in a manner that one would hardly credit were it not so thoroughly well attested. He had given some offence to the Grant family. On the Sunday, December 8, 1811, as Mr. Ramsay was giving out his text from "the first Epistle of Peter," one of the young Grants sprang up, and said, "Nay, I think it's the last epistle of Peter here," and with a number of rough lads stormed the pulpit, "punced" (i.e., kicked) in the panel of the pulpit door, and hustled the minister into the chapel yard. What is more, the Grants discountenanced those of their workmen who listened to Ramsay's subsequent open air preaching. After a year or two this ejected minister settled at Haslingden, where he spent a useful ministry of over thirty years.

Affiliation with Scottish Presbyterianism.

It is at this point that we find the Holcombe Chapel being drawn into the stream of the Scottish Presbyterian movement, owing to the influence of the Grants and other Scotsmen employed by them domiciled in the district. The Rev. Thomas Nelson, a Scotsman, was procured as minister for a few years, but was not regularly ordained to the pastorate. In 1817 application was made through Dr. Jack, of Manchester, to the Associate (Burgher) Synod to be taken under their inspection, which was allowed, and supply of sermon granted. In the next year a call was given to George Brown, LL.D., of Aberdeen, and the church is spoken of in the call as "the Associate Congregation of Holcombe." We also find it described later as being "under the United Associate Presbytery of London in connection with the United Associate Synod of the Secession Church of Scotland." What a title! This was evidently regarded as quite a fresh start; the old name, Holcombe, was dropped, and the new name, "Ramsbottom," officially adopted to designate the congregation. In Mackelvie's annals of the United Presbyterian Church (p. 485) the Rev. George Brown is described as "first and sole minister" of Ramsbottom, and against the place is put in brackets (now extinct). This does not mean that the congregation dispersed when Dr. Brown left through pressure by the Grants, in 1829, but it was then hitched on to another branch of Scottish Presbyterianism. Under his successor, the Rev. Andrew McLean, D.D., it was placed under the Lancashire Presbytery in connnection with the Church of Scotland.

In 1832 the Grants built a beautiful Gothic church (St. Andrews) in a fine position, for the use of the congregation, which was largely made up of their work-people, and the old chapel was then used for a Sunday school. The Grants also found the minister's stipend. But this new church was never put in trust, and the ministerial endowment was never invested as such; all remained in the hands of the Grant family. In 1869, when the older generation had died, William Grant, a nephew of the founder, gave Dr. McLean a month's notice to quit the place, offering him at the same time a retiring pension. The congregation was shut out of the church. In 1871 this building was reopened as an Episcopal Church, being consecrated by Bishop Fraser, of Manchester. Once again the congregation returned to the old chapel in Holcombe for their public worship, and, under the Rev. J. Kerr Craig, who followed, on Dr. McLean's death, they bravely began to build the present St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church, opened in 1873 under the Rev. W. Hume Elliot, who still ministers there.

Independents v. Presbyterians.

But this is not quite the end of the story. While the Presbyterian Congregation now met for worship in their new building down in Ramsbottom, the old chapel in Nuttall-lane continued to be used for day and Sunday-school purposes. It is pretty clear that some tradition of the old type of English Nonconformity and Independency clung to the place. Some of the officials and teachers of the school, and members of the church, chafing against what Dr. Watson, of Liverpool, has aptly termed "the straitness of the Scotch method of thought, and the extraordinary formality of the Scotch method of procedure," made an attempt to secure Home Rule for themselves at the old place, which had come to be known as Dundee Chapel. They held possession of the building, and claimed it as Independents. They kept the key, and refused to admit the Presbyterians either to the manse or the chapel. In the absence of deeds, which for the time being were lost, those in actual possession appeared to have the best of it. But in 1883, as a result of the Presbyterian minister's inquiries, the deed of 1811, "renewing and extending the trust," was found, and he promptly convened a meeting of his congregation in the St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church, Ramsbottom, and appointed new trustees under Sir Morton Peto's Act. Litigation then ensued. A suit of ejectment was brought against the occupants of the old chapel, and the case came on at the Liverpool Assizes in May, 1885. The defendants were not able to establish their claim that the place was specifically "Independent" to the satisfaction of Mr. Justice A. L. Smith, and he ordered them to yield possession of the chapel and its appurtenances to the plaintiff Presbyterians. Meanwhile, on December 6, 1884, the foundation stone of an Independent school had been laid a little lower down the lane than the old Dundee Chapel, and those whe now had to turn out migrated to this new building, which is now known as Dundee Congregational Church.

Conclusion.

When the Presbyterians had regained possession of old Dundee Chapel they used it for a time as a branch Sunday-school from St. Andrew's, and then for an elementary day school. I am informed that it is now only used for occasional parties. I visited Holcombe on a bright day in the spring, approaching it by the old Bury and Blackburn highway that runs high up along the hillside. The old pastoral life of Lancashire continues on these hills, the new manufacturing life of the county keeps low down in the valleys. The half-yearly sale of stock was being held at "The Shoulder of Mutton" Inn, where a few "lonk sheep and stirks" changed hands. Turning down the steep hill known as "The Rake" past the finely situated Episcopal Church, the old chapel, whose strange history we have briefly sketched, is soon reached. Its entrance is at the north-west end, looking up the hill. The long side of the building is parallel with the road. The windows are round-headed. It is of three bays. The old chapel-house at the south-east end of the chapel has been pulled down, and in its place there has just been built a roomy and comfortable looking manse, in which the present minister of the St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church, Ramsbottom, now lives. I could not help speculating as to whether this might not have become a centre of Unitarian work and worship, if the old Nonconformist congregations had not in past days been so self-centred and individualistic, and if town and country churches had remained in closer touch.

WALTER H. BURGESS.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

LIVERPOOL DISTRICT.

THE common work of our churches and their members demands our first attention. We have endeavoured to broaden the base of our Missionary Association by inviting representatives of all churches, whether "assisted" or not, to a general council; but the non-legal mind of the junior secretary allowed some ambiguity to arise concerning the powers of the council and the executive committee. This, however, can be put right at the next annual meeting.

Our general position may be indicated in a short sentence. We have three churches with evening service, one missionary, a deficit of £225, a debt on the building fund of £175, and a shortage of £100 in necessary annual income. Towards the last financial bugbear we have promises of about £80; and if the gentlemen who received pathetic appeals from the secretaries, and have not yet replied, would respond according to their ability at the sight of this provincial letter, we should certainly have at least £120 to £150 in additional subscriptions. Even then our local offerings would not equal our annual expenditure by £80 or £50. To balance financially, given even £100 increased income, Liverpool must still depend on £100 from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. One secretary thinks this dependence shameful; the rest of the committee show no trace of a blush.

Begging for money is a very curious experience. You learn so much. Men tell you their basal opinions. Your missionary Association does not rank high in the scale of relative values: Unitarianism is only a line of thought; it is not a sect; and, mainly, it is not even worth a letter in reply. Now let us admit that minds of independent calibre stand to differ. Then let me say that the first opinion, according to my scale of values, is rank blasphemy. Oh, that the propounder of it could be a missionary, if only for a month! And if this Unitarianism were only "a line of thought," it may be remarked that martyrs have gone to the stake for less. I believe it is much more than a sect; and thus believing, count it open and free in its grand proclamation of a rational Gospel of sympathy and love. To the fourth class—the forgetful or zero class, may I respectfully suggest that secretaries and treasurers, even of missionary associations, really have special work of their own to perform in the stress of life; and can devote only a portion of their days to beseeching aid for a noble cause.

Just lately my eye has been cast over the first existent minute book of our Association. May history repeat itself! "Financially speaking, the Association will enter on its tenth year of life (1870) with a clean book. The treasurer's accounts show indeed a very considerable deficiency, arising from various causes, but this has been generously made up by the kindness of a few friends who expressed 'a strong wish that the Association should begin its new year free from debt, and thus enable the committee to regulate its expenditure, and keep within its income.'"

A sentence from Mr. Cuckson's report, that same year, may reach the hearts which I have been unable to touch:—

> In seeking to obtain [a new church (Hamilton-road), we do not desire simply to perpetuate or glorify a sect, to enter into dogmatic and party strife; but to popularise that method in the study of theology which has been applied with such wonderful success in other sciences, and to aid in securing the moral well-being and the religious life of Society.

"Pragmatism" is said to be the coming philosophy. To define it might be difficult; but a few extracts from the old minute book will lucidly illustrate its scope:—

> Southport (1863), in addition to defraying all local expenses, contributed £30 to the Association.
> Southport (1864), raised £700 towards their chapel.
> Southport (1865), secured land for chapel, and gave £60 to the Association.
> Southport (1866) has engaged a minister, and has collected nearly £2,000 towards the chapel. They are now an independent congregation.

In those days there was a "Mr. Mott" on the committee of the L.D.M.A.

Has a subtle change crept in since 1866? If not, why are the men and women of a free faith so silent in Hoylake and West Kirby? Had there been the least call, when a missionary was appointed in 1900, his services were at their disposal. But, as gladly, he went to the Gentiles in Widnes, Runcorn, and St. Helens.

Mr. Farley has now taken up his abode in St. Helens, and we strongly wish that he could give his entire attention to that important centre. But, alas! Widnes demands half of him; whilst we "supply" Garston on Sunday evenings in the winter from Liverpool, and chiefly by our splendid lay preachers—men and women. In the summer Garston enjoys the continuous services of Mr. Hirst, who also generously interests himself in the winter week-night lectures. This Association should be proud of the self-sacrificing personal elements in its forward career. Is it possible that Liverpool can grudge only money?

Welcome news comes from across the water that Liscard is girding itself for a bazaar in December, 1905, in order to set up as an independent congregation. The motive is so good that the scheme cannot possibly fail. Liverpool and Birkenhead will see to that; even though Birkenhead has its own campaign for financial aid.

From little Bootle we hear of an effort to enlarge the annual income by the sum of £50. The committee "confidently appeals to the members for help in any of the following ways:—(1) Special donations, large or small, to clear off the existing deficit; (2) increased annual subscriptions; (3) increased weekly offerings."

All honour to both churches.

But the L.D.M.A. is not the only fine combination in this district. There is a Sunday School Society which stirs our hearts, and inspires a warm affection. The huger Manchester Association bewails its defection from filial allegiance; but will rejoice to know that the society is going strong, and becoming lusty. On a recent Saturday there was a company of sixty to listen to excellent expositions from teachers of how particular lessons were prepared—and received. If there was a touch of pathos at the narration of the chasm 'twixt preparation and reception, it was relieved by the stoical good-humour of the narrators. We feel we are a solidarity; and if the murky Mersey did not prove the barrier it does, and we saw more of the Cheshire contingents, our Society would be a complete and happy family. It rejoices in a "continuing" secretary.

Our other institutions are the grand missions. Someone whispered the other day that Mill-street Domestic Mission is sadly in need of Sunday-school teachers. Mill-street is always in need of something; but the cases of the Missionary Association and of it are reversed. The Association is fully equipped—barring a second missionary—with personal interest and service. Mill-street is always equipped with money. Who will volunteer the "person" here; and who will take up that fine class of Miss Wells' at Bond-street? Many of the stalwarts, already occupied in the strenuous field, look longingly; but atoms do not yet occupy two positions at the same time. A new-comer is required. Is it true that Hamilton-road finds its native supply of teachers ample? If true, it is a very honourable fact.

Our work in all departments is, we believe, being efficiently carried on. Good news travels from Southport. A few weeks ago the Bishop remarked that Southport was not so close to Liverpool as many other parts. We find it so, when we are not invited to its functions. It was a grief that the report of the unveiling of the memorial window to our dear friend, Charles Wellbeloved, came to us only through the press. This is being too self-sufficing. But a collection or subscription of £30 to £60 to the L.D.M.A. will bring us closer together. My memory holds vividly an appeal I made at a congregational tea-party at Southport, when their minister, in his blunt, genial, naïf way turned and said, "You couldn't have put it plainer, if you'd asked them straight out." I am "asking straight out" now.

The new minister of Ullet-road Church rejoices, in his calendar, and we rejoice with him, that the summer evening congregations kept up so well. Mr. and Mrs. Odgers will not thank us possibly for adding, what we all feel, how pleasant and helpful it is to have them personally interested in all our doings. But this particular truth must out. Mr. and Mrs. Craddock, who were just about to arrive at the time of the last Provincial Letter, and dislocated all our perspective, have settled down so firmly that they are about to remove house. We are glad to think that they and "The Ancient" favour one another. Warrington seems to look more towards Manchester than Liverpool, but Mr. Harvey Cook is of us, and we are always glad to have his effective presence at our gatherings.

Talking of Mill-street reminds me of Chester. They have both had presentations for long and faithful service; and Mr. Lloyd Jones, Mr. Anderton, and Mr. Arthur Orrett are a trio of whose work any community might rightly boast. That old Chester chapel, by the way, judging from the number of little ceremonies that happen there, must be feeling the renewed efflorescence of youth.

A word in conclusion will justly fall to Hope-street Church, which has embarked on an enterprise of faith in services for the people in the hall of the Liverpool Institute. Not content with one series of five, the committee, utterly regardless of their personal desire to return for evening service to the church, determined on another series of four. The attendances have been "full"—to very much less than full; but there is no mistaking the significance of this movement under the general title of "Religion without Dogma."

The newspapers and the orthodox churches have been much exercised about the term "dogma." It looks too much like a slur upon them, and, though they admit they do possess the thing signified, they do not want us to have any credit for the lack of it. Dr. Torrey apparently is the only real believer, for he is preaching "Religion with Dogma." Large personal testimony has been borne to the excellence and efficacy of our Faith by men who have long been seeking. That is our justification and our reward.

Even at the end of a long epistle mention must be made of Mr. Philip Snowden, who preached once for us at the Institute. One wondered what manner of man he might be; but the first sight of that refined, sensitive face put us completely at ease. And if the audience applauded, many, we must remember, had come to hear and honour their prophet; and when he stirred them and made them feel, somewhere in the region of the chest, they gave forth. But, along with the speaker's impassioned platform manner, there was deep religious earnestness.

A Liverpool letter is incomplete without mention of our famous "institution"—Mr. Armstrong—whose travelling lectures have positively done him good. His many friends will be again glad to hear that he is more vigorous than ever. The day of the veteran is not over either, when Mr. Hawkes can get about the country like a two-year-old. He always has a "throat," or so he says: but he can still give us good lessons in the art of speech.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

APPEAL.

Manchester Domestic Mission. — The Rev. J. W. Bishop, of the Willert-street Mission-street Mission, Collyhurst, makes an urgent appeal, not only for the usual Christmas gifts, but for further help to meet the needs of unusual destitution and suffering in his district. The work of the Mission in a poor district of nearly 20,000 inhabitants needs all the encouragement that can be given. There is a Sunday-school, with an attendance of more than 400 every Sunday, and an evening congregation which overcrowds the little chapel. A young people's guild and working men's club, and, above all, the home visiting of the missionary, are among the constant efforts made for the good of the people. Gifts both of money and clothing are sorely needed, and will be gratefully received by Mr. Bishop at the Mission. Another account of the work and the needs of the Domestic Mission will be found in another column.

Birmingham: Balsall Heath.—The annual report of "Our Fathers' Church," which meets for worship in the Moseley and Balsall Heath Institute, was presented at the annual meeting on Nov. 9, and showed in the financial statement a small credit balance. The receipts included £20 granted by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. The services are now held in the small upper hall, which has proved quite convenient, and the church, under the ministry of the Rev. C. J. Sneath, is animated by a hopeful spirit.

Boston.—A stirring address was given last Sunday evening by Mr. Fred Maddison in Spain-lane Chapel, to a large audience. His subject was "Religion and Labour," and the aim of the address was to show the practical nature of true religion, which enters into daily life, and has a word to say about temperance and sanitary reform. He touched upon the causes that alienate the masses from religion as represented by the churches, such as incredible dogmas, the power of vested interests, the wealth of the bishops and the poverty of many curates, the worship of Mammon, the opposition of the Church to needful reforms in education, &c., and the justification of Chinese slavery as a regrettable necessity. On Thursday evening, 17th inst., a very interesting and instructive lecture on the life and works of the late G. F. Watts, R.A., was given in the Assembly Rooms by the Rev. Lucking Tavener, of Ipswich. The lecture was greatly enjoyed by a large audience. The Town Clerk, Mr. R. W. Staniland, presided, and at the conclusion moved a vote of thanks to the lecturer.

Burnley (Welcome Meeting).—On Saturday, Nov. 19, the Rev. J. Morgan-Whiteman was welcomed as minister of the Trafalgar road Unitarian Church. Alderman Bibby gave a reception in the afternoon, followed by tea and an evening meeting in the chapel, where he took the chair as president, and on behalf of the congregation, offered a cordial welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Whiteman. Mr. J. S. Mackie also spoke on behalf of the congregation, making a plea for more earnestness and reverence, and looking hopefully to the future. Mr. J. T. Bibby spoke on behalf of the Sunday-school, Mr. P. J. Hargreaves on behalf of the Burnley-lane Mission. Of the ministers present, the Rev. J. L. Haigh spoke as a friend who had worked with Mr. Whiteman in Liverpool, the Revs. J. E. Jenkins and J. J. Shaw as neighbours, the Rev. R. T. Herford as representing the N. and E.L. Unitarian Mission, while three local ministers of other bodies, of Wesleyan, Congregational, and Baptist churches, joined cordially in the welcome. Mr. Whiteman, in his response, acknowledged with special pleasure the part they had taken in the meeting.

Bury District Sunday School Union.—A lantern lecture, entitled, "In and about our old chapels," was given in the Bank-street school-room last Saturday evening by the Rev. W. H. Burgess, of Accrington. The Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans was in the chair, and there was a fair attendance. Thanks to the lecturer and to the Bank-street friends for their hospitality concluded the meeting, which had begun with tea.

Coventry.—As will be seen by the advertisement in another column, a sale of work is to be held next Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, Dec. 1, 2, and 3, in aid of the renovation fund. Over £100 has been raised by the congregation, and it is hoped by this effort to raise sufficient to commence the work at once. The support and attendance of all friends is earnestly invited.

Denton (Resignation). — The Rev. H. Rawlings has sent in his resignation, which is to take effect at the end of February.

London: Wandsworth.—The "Coming of Age" of the Sunday-school was celebrated last Sunday by special services. The hymn written for the occasion by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, the founder of the school, is printed in another column. At the morning service Mr. Tarrant read for the second lesson some fine passages from Channing's Discourse on the Sunday School. In a letter to the scholars, printed on a special hymn paper for the afternoon Children's service, he says: "Many of you have done very well, thus far; and I am as proud of your good character and usefulness as you can be of your prizes and distinctions. Good scholars are their teacher's prizes; and if any of you feel you have not been as good as you ought, do not lose heart, but go on trying, and you will win the best crown by and by." At that service addresses were given by Mr. A. H. Biggs, Mr. H. W. James (who spoke as an old scholar), Mr. Ion Pritchard (hon. sec. of the S.S.A.), and Mr. Tarrant. At the close Mr. Tarrant's Young People's Class made a presentation to him of a writing-case and an engrossed address, and the whole school gave him an album with good wishes on the occasion of the celebration, and containing the signatures of all the scholars, even to the "marks" of the infants who cannot yet write their names. At the evening service Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer" was sung as the anthem. It is interesting to note that most of the choir are now scholars or old scholars of the school.

Mossley.—On Saturday, November 19, the Ladies' Sewing Society held their annual sale of work. Miss Elliott, daughter of the late Rev. T. R. Elliott, opened the sale in a brief address. The chair was occupied by the Mayor of the borough (Mr. Edward Iredale), who complimented the congregation on the work they were doing. The sale was well attended, and the proceeds of the day amounted to upwards of £120.

Northampton. — The "Merrie England" bazaar in aid of the funds of the Kettering-road Church, on Nov. 16 and 17, was so successful that it was continued for a third day, and the gross takings amounted to £125. The bazaar was opened on the first day by Mrs. Abbot, sister of the late Lady Manfield, Mrs. Arthur Harvie, the minister's wife presiding. The school-room was converted for the time being into a street of an English country town of the sixteenth century, the stalls representing Elizabethan half-timber gabled houses. Among the entertainments a scene from "Midsummer Night's Dream" was given each day.

Pantdefaid.—We are glad to note that Mr. John Thomas, a member of this congregation and a nephew of the Rev. Thomas Thomas, J.P., of Green Park, has been made a magistrate.

Sidmouth.—An interesting course of lectures is being given in the Old Meeting Chapel, by the Rev. William Agar, on such subjects as "Does Prayer Change God?" "Does Prayer Change Men?" "Are Miracles Helps or Hindrances to our Faith?" "Is Unitarianism a Faith chiefly concerned with Denials?" Such autumn courses of lectures have been found of great service both to members of the congregation and outsiders.

Stalybridge.—At the parents' annual party in the schools on Saturday Nov. 19, tea was served to upwards of 350 persons, and the opportunity was taken to welcome the Rev. W. G. Price, the newly appointed minister, and Mrs. Price. The warden, Mr. Jas. Jackson, offered a cordial welcome to them on behalf of the congregation, and Mr. William Thompson spoke on behalf of the Sunday-school. Representatives from the following societies also spoke:—Ladies' Society, Dramatic Society, Band of Hope, Young Men and Young Women's Classes. The following ministers and friends made suitable speeches:—Revs. W. G. Cadman, and H. Bodell Smith; Mr. J. Hall Brooks, President of East Cheshire Union, and Mr. James Kerfoot, Dukinfield, and Mr. Price made an earnest reply.

Todmorden.—On Saturday and Sunday last Rev. W. Copeland Bowie visited Todmorden. On the Saturday a tea and reception was held which was attended by about 200 members of the church and school. Mr. James Crabtree (warden) presided, and addresses were delivered by the minister, Rev. A. W. Fox, and Mr. Bowie. Recitals were given by Mr. John Stansfield, the church choir rendered several glees and songs, and opportunity was given for conversation and games. On Sunday the church anniversary services were held, and Mr. Bowie preached to good congregations morning and evening. In the afternoon he addressed the young men and women of the Sunday-school (about 90 in number) on the work of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. The young people were much interested in the report given of the varied activities of the Association, and Councillor Wadsworth and the minister voiced their sentiments. At the evening service Mr. Bowie preached impressively on "Unitarian Affirmations." The collections at the services in the church amounted to £18 5s., an increase of £3 10s. on last year.

NEW UNITARIAN CHURCH, BIRKENHEAD.

IN Birkenhead for many years the dwelling portion of the town has been receding gradually from the neighbourhood of the Unitarian Church, and the consequent decrease in numbers made a change inevitable. From the amount realised by the sale of the old site, the sum of £5,000 was allotted for a new building, and a contract was made at this figure; but, owing chiefly to errors of judgment on the part of professional advisers, the final cost amounted to £7,000, exclusive of the land and of furnishing expenses.

The Congregation has done, and is doing, all that is possible in subscribing and raising money. In addition to subscriptions for the Church Building Fund, between £2,000 and £3,000 have been raised since 1897 for building Schools.

At the beginning of this year the total debt amounted to about £1,800, but this has now been reduced to about £1,100 by the subscriptions recorded below. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association warmly commend the endeavour to clear off the debt, and promise £100 as an expression of their interest, which they trust will be helpful. The Congregation appeal therefore for help to their fellow-worshippers in the Unitarian Body, so that unhampered by debt they may take advantage of the opportunity for increased activity, and spread in Birkenhead that faith which all Unitarians have at heart. Contributions will be gratefully acknowledged by

MANCHESTER COLLEGE.

WE record with the utmost satisfaction the result of the special meeting of the Trustees of Manchester College, held on Tuesday at Oxford, and have done our best to furnish at once a full report of the proceedings. By a decisive vote of 113 to 29 the Trustees accepted the amendment moved on behalf of the Committee, and declared that they "will do nothing to limit for themselves and their successors the freedom the College has inherited and has enjoyed for nearly a century and a quarter."

Thus the College stands where it did, a Free School of Theology, and a place of training for ministers of religion, "open to young men of every religious denomination, from whom no test or confession of faith will be required." The College is devoted now, as it has been from the first, to the training of men for the ministry of those Free Churches which, with open trusts, are based upon the same broad unsectarian principle as itself, but it is none the less open to men of all denominations who desire to be trained for the ministry by its teachers and in its atmosphere of freedom. There may still be for years very few or none coming from other bodies for such training and intent hereafter to serve in the ministry of those bodies, but the great principle of catholic inclusiveness, which it has been from the first the ideal of the College to maintain, is once more vindicated, and from its side, at any rate, nothing is done to the injury of that high aim.

The contention of the Committee that they had been faithful to their trust in advising a student that the full benefits of the College were still open to him, though he had expressed his intention of taking orders in the Church of England, and in urging him, if he felt able to do so, to complete his full course at Manchester College, has received ample vindication, not only by the unmistakable vote of Tuesday, but by the very powerful support of high legal authority. Mr. WORTHINGTON read to the meeting of Trustees an opinion which he had obtained from Mr. HALDANE, K.C., after laying before him a full and impartial statement of the case. Mr. HALDANE, who, it is well known, stands in such matters at the head of the Chancery Bar, and was the very best authority to consult on the points now in controversy with regard to the Trusts of the College, gave it as his unqualified opinion that the College, by virtue of its foundation declarations is in the completest sense free; that it is open to men of all denominations, and that a member of the Church of England, desiring to be trained for the ministry in the College, has as much right to full benefits, as any other man. And we would remind our readers that this opinion, which is of the very highest value, is in complete accord with that given some time ago to Dr. DRUMMOND, and now quite recently confirmed, by the present MASTER OF THE ROLLS in Ireland. Thus the freedom in which we have rejoiced is declared to rest upon a sure foundation, and with the utmost thankfulness we may take up once more the service of this high trust.

To what use is the freedom of the College to be put? Certainly not to weaken in the least degree the intimate connection and the close sympathy between its work and the religious life of the Free Churches, which it is set to serve. It is the earnest endeavour of those who are entrusted with the management of the College to secure the best teaching, to perfect the means and enlarge the opportunities for the training of the men to be devoted to the ministry of those churches. And if other students should come in from different connections and destined for service in a different field, so much the better for all, for the enlargement of charity and a wide outlook upon the world, a strengthening of the spirit of a common devotion to one great service, though at different posts of duty. The fear which has been expressed in some quarters, that Manchester College is to be devoted to other uses, to the detriment of its main intent, and the best interest of the people among whom it had its birth, we hold to be entirely groundless. The churches indeed must do their part, and produce the men who are to be trained, men of high capacity and devoted character, and they need not fear that the College will fail in its part.

One word as to the teaching staff. Mr. Tarrant in his speech followed the "Historical Statement" in referring to resolutions of the Committee in 1798, on the appointment of a Church of England clergyman as classical tutor, as though their purpose was to prevent the Churchman from having any influence on the religious teaching of the College. But the resolutions themselves say that "the Institution is founded on the most liberal and catholic principles," designed for men "without distinction of political party or religious persuasion," and what they seek to secure is that the clergyman, if appointed, shall "regard it as a duty not to oppose or to interfere with the instructions of the Professor of Theology," and that the students "in these critical and turbulent times" shall be guarded against "controversies in religion or disputes in politics." The Committee want a man of moderation, exempt "from polemic zeal." So in 1798. Now in 1904 the College has such a man in Mr. Addis. We are thankful to believe that he and his colleagues may now pursue their devoted labours for the welfare of their students, undisturbed by thoughts of the episode of controversy, which is past.

A SPECIAL meeting of the Trustees of Manchester College, called on the requisition of forty-five Trustees, was held in the library of the College at Oxford, on Tuesday, November 29, to consider a resolution of which notice had been given, and an amendment, to be moved on behalf of the committee.

The Rev. S. A. Steinthal, President of the College, took the chair at half-past eleven, the following trustees being also present :—the Revs. Dr. Drummond (Principal), C. B. Upton, J. E. Carpenter, J. E. Odgers, and L. P. Jacks (of the Teaching Staff), P. H. Wicksteed (Visitor), D. Agate, H. Austin, J. W. Austin, A. Bennett, A. N. Blatchford, W. Blazeby, A. Chalmers, C. C. Worsley, Richard Worsley, A. H. Worthington, A. W. Worthington, P. S. Worthington, S. B. Worthington, Thos. Worthington, W. B. Worthington, J. W. Wostenholme, and others.

The PRESIDENT, in opening the proceedings, expressed the hope that, however much they might differ on the question to be considered, they would remember that there was no one in that room not animated by a strong desire in every possible way to promote the welfare of Manchester College. Whatever decision they came to at last, he hoped that they would all part good friends and with a warmer desire to work for the interests of that College, which was very dear to some of them, who owed it a debt of gratitude they could never repay.

On the suggestion of the Rev. LAWRENCE SCOTT, seconded by Mr. JESSE HIND, it was agreed, after a brief discussion, that after the mover and seconder of the resolution and the Committee's amendment had spoken, speeches should be limited in time to ten minutes. The question of when the resolution should be put, as to which proposals were also made, was left to the President's discretion.

Mr. A. H. WORTHINGTON (hon. sec.) announced letters of apology for absence from the Rev. R. A. Armstrong (one of the Visitors), Mr. David Ainsworth, Mr. Charles W. Jones (treasurer), Mr. J. H. Brooks, the Revs. W. E. George and G. Fox, Miss Short, Messrs. J. S. Nettlefold, Edward Nettlefold, Eustace Swanwick, J. S. Ainsworth, H. J. Morton, and Mrs. R. Crompton Jones. Some of those letters he would ask leave to read at a later stage, as it seemed hardly fair to the mover and seconder of the resolution to begin with a letter which did not take their side before they had spoken.

Mr. Harrison's Resolution.

Mr. JOHN HARRISON then moved the following resolution, of which he had given notice.

That, inasmuch as the successful Petition, on behalf of the majority of the Trustees, to the Rolls Court in 1853, asked for a declaration that Manchester New College should "be established in London "as a Theological Institution for the education of young men designed for the Ministry among Protestant Dissenters," and affirmed that "the objects of the Trustees and other contributors" to the Manchester Academy "was solely and entirely the advantage of Protestant Dissenters who conscientiously refused subscription to creeds" ; and no objection was taken by any Trustee at that time to the statement that the Institution was specifically intended for this purpose ;

And, as it was then (April 13, 1853) judicially declared by the Master of the Rolls that "the whole Institution" of the Manchester Academy, which had become Manchester New College, was "especially devoted for the purpose of affording its advantages to the class or denomination of persons commonly called English Presbyterian Protestant Dissenters" ; and "the original design of the Institution," "which should always be borne in mind," was declared by the learned Judge to be "to train young men of that denomination of Dissenters to the sacred Ministry" ;

And, as the Trustees, in special Meeting assembled (April 16, 1857), clearly showed their estimate of the College by declaring that the Institution was "founded for the sole purpose of giving University learning to students for the Christian Ministry among Non-subscribing Dissenters, without test or confession of faith" ;

And, as Manchester New College has now become Manchester College, Oxford, and as such inherits and continues the principle and purpose of the original institution" ;

It is hereby declared that the historical principle of the College is that it is a Non-subscribing Protestant Dissenting Institution ; that its essential purpose is the training of students for a ministry of religion in which no theological test is imposed ; and that no portion of the funds of the College can properly be applied for any purpose inconsistent with the principles of Nonconformity and Non-subscription.

He said :—

It is my duty to introduce the resolution which stands in my name ; but, before doing so, I wish to make a few preliminary observations.

Many things have been said or written implying that the resolution which I am about to move on behalf of the protesting trustees is intended, either as a vote of want of confidence in, or as a vote of censure on, the honoured managers and professors of Manchester College. Nothing whatever could be farther from the intention of the framers of the resolution. If they had meant this they would have said so.

There exists at the present time an honest difference of opinion as to administration between the Committee and the Protesting Trustees which calls for a reference to the general body of Trustees.

The questions which the Trustees of the College are called upon to decide to-day are :—First, whether the funds of the College can be legitimately used for the maintenance of those who have joined, or announce their intention of joining creed-bound churches ; and, secondly, whether the College is to remain, as intended by the Founders, a Protestant Dissenting Institution, where no tests or confessions of faith are recognised, or is to become an establishment where those (either teachers or taught) who submit to tests and acknowledge confessions of faith are to be placed on the same footing as those who do not.

The Protesting Trustees maintain that if the College funds are used in aid of a church that is creed-bound, such a proceeding must necessarily be a violation of the fundamental principles of the College. The priceless heritage which has come down to us from our forefathers is a free institution intended for the use of free men. However free the Trustees may be from binding deeds, they are nevertheless under an honourable obligation to respect and carry out the clearly expressed intentions of the Founders. Because I, and those who are acting with me, desire that the intentions of the Founders should be carried out in what we consider to be their integrity, we are said to be making an attempt to restrict the ancient liberties of the College, and are accused of wishing to lower it into a sectarian seminary. In full view of the resolutions passed on the foundation of the Manchester Academy, I cannot allow that in objecting to the proposal to subsidise a student belonging to a creed-bound church we are attempting to restrict the ancient liberties of the College, neither can I agree that the re-affirmation of the fact that the College is a Protestant Dissenting Institution is, as it has been described, a most serious innovation striking at the root of the principles of the College. A Protestant dissenting institution can never be a sectarian seminary, unless it exacts the adoption of a creed, test, or confession of faith. Is Protestant Dissent a sect ? I venture to think not. The term merely expresses a protest against the Church of Rome, and a dissent from the Church of England. A Protestant dissenter need not be supposed to belong to any creed-bound sect whatever. He was clearly, in the opinion of those who founded the Manchester Academy, simply a person who did not recognise tests or confessions of faith. I therefore repeat that I cannot admit that Manchester College is lowered into the position of a sectarian seminary when it is described as a Protestant Dissenting Institution. If it is, it has been a sectarian seminary all through its history. The Manchester Academy was founded by Protestant dissenters, it was presided over at its initiation by two Protestant dissenting tutors (one of whom, with the assent of his colleague, in a Protestant Dissenting chapel, declared in the clearest possible manner that the Academy was established for Protestant dissenters), it was supported by Protestant dissenting funds, which were entrusted to a Protestant dissenting treasurer. Is there anyone bold enough to affirm after carefully reading the records of 1786 that the sturdy Protestant dissenters who founded the Manchester Academy had any intention of founding a sectarian seminary? I think not. Yet "Protestant Dissent" was a term evidently expressive of their views and aims. The Academy was founded as an institution which distinctly repudiated all tests and confessions of faith. The Moving Trustees feel it their duty to defend the sacred heritage of freedom which has come down to them from their forefathers, and protest against any violation of the fundamental principle of both Academy and College. They maintain, and they ask their fellow Trustees to affirm, that the College funds cannot legitimately be used for the benefit of those who become members of creed-bound churches, whether they be teachers or taught.

I have been requested to move this resolution because I am the direct descendant of one of the two tutors to whom the management of the Manchester Academy was entrusted on its foundation in 1786. My great-grandfather, the Rev. Ralph Harrison, was for thirty-nine years co-pastor of Cross-street Chapel, Manchester, with the Rev. Dr. Barnes. He was, moreover, entrusted, in conjunction with Dr. Barnes, with the management and control of the Manchester Academy. When the said Academy was founded there was no Principal, but two Tutors, enjoying equal power and authority.

The Manchester Academy was founded without any trust deed, though one was ordered to be made. The only manner in which it is possible to ascertain the intentions of the Founders of the Academy is by reference to a book, of which I have a copy with me, containing an account of the meeting at which it was decided to request the Rev. Dr. Barnes and the Rev. Ralph Harrison to undertake the management of the Academy. This book contains also the sermons preached by the Rev. Ralph Harrison in Cross-street Chapel, Manchester on March 26, 1786, on the occasion of the establishment of the Manchester Academy, at the wish of the Academy Trustees, and a copy of the sermon preached by the Rev. Dr. Barnes on the opening of the Academy on September 14, 1786.

From the report of the proceedings on the establishment of the Academy, and from the discourses of the two reverend gentlemen who were entrusted with the management of the institution, we may safely gather what were the opinions and intentions of those by whom the Manchester Academy, now Manchester College, Oxford, was founded and brought into existence. It is necessary to bear in mind that the Academy from its earliest years, was closely identified with a Protestant Dissenting Chapel, and that the gentlemen whose names are mentioned as signing the request asking the two ministers of Cross-street to undertake the management of the new institution, were chiefly, if not entirely, members of the Cross-street congregation, and, in consequence, avowed Protestant Dissenters.

In the book to which I have alluded the Manchester Academy was expressly declared to be an Institution for young men of every religious denomination from whom no test or confession of faith would be required.

The proceedings of the first Trustees, and the explanations given in the discourses of the co-pastors of Cross-street, make it clear that the funds solicited and subscribed for the purposes of the new Academy could only, with justice, be used for the benefit of young men of religious denominations which do not exact tests or confessions of faith.

This opinion is founded on the sermon preached by the Rev. Ralph Harrison on March 26, 1786, which shows beyond doubt what were the intentions of those who founded and those who managed the new Academy. The sermon in question was subsequently published at the request of the Trustees. The preacher stated that the principal occasion of his discourse, delivered at the particular request of the Trustees of the congregation (the governing body of an assembly of Protestant Dissenters) was to explain more fully the nature of the Institution. He then proceeded to plead what he described as our CAUSE as Protestant Dissenters, and went on to say that those who dissented from the National Establishment were under a necessity of establishing institutions of their own, especially to prepare their ministers for the respectable exercise of the sacred office. The preacher, moreover, declared that the drawing up of creeds or confessions of faith by fallible men was an unwarrantable and dangerous imposition.

In the discourse delivered by Dr. Barnes on the opening of the Academy the preacher said nothing whatever which might lead us to suppose that he disagreed with his colleague, Harrison. The two co-pastors of Cross-street Chapel were in perfect accord during the whole of the thirty-nine years of their long co-pastorate. Dr. Barnes echoed the sentiments of his colleague, and insisted on the importance of the education of ministers in the principles of liberty. He reminded the Founders that they had asked whether they could not have ministers educated amongst themselves of whose sentiments they could form a more certain knowledge, and, after begging his hearers to pray that the sacred cause to which the Academy was devoted might extend its influence abroad, he solemnly dedicated the new Institution to Truth, to Liberty, and to Religion.

Now what was the sacred cause to which the Manchester Academy was solemnly devoted in the opinion of those who founded and those who managed the Institution when first it sprang into existence? It was the cause of those, who, dissenting from the National Establishment, were thereby under the necessity of establishing institutions of their own at their own expense, especially to prepare their own ministers for the respectable exercise of their sacred office. It was the cause of those who considered the drawing up of creeds by fallible men to be an unwarrantable and dangerous imposition. This view of the question is strengthened by the 13th Resolution passed at the meeting of the Founders, which runs as follows:—

> That application be made to some of the more distant and opulent societies of Dissenters for contributions to support the students in Divinity.

Would it have been honest to invite the more distant and opulent societies of Dissenters to contribute to the support of the students in Divinity, had it been intended that such students would be permitted to complete their course of study at the expense of the Academy, even if they had avowed their intention of undermining the very principle which the said Dissenters valued most? Would Dr. Barnes have allowed that the creeds of the Established Church and the principles of Liberty on which he insisted had anything in common?

A college which neither applies tests nor expects confessions of faith should not, I submit, devote its funds to the education of those who annouce their intention of ministering in churches where thought is fettered. Free education in a free institution can only be intended for free men.

I have studied most carefully the Resolutions of the first Trustees passed on the formation of the Academy; I have read the reports of the various proceedings in the Law Courts when the affairs of the Manchester Academy and its successors, Manchester New College and Manchester College, have been under consideration, but I have seen nothing which has tended to shake my belief that the Academy was founded as a free institution, intended to be used solely for the preparation for a free ministry. The Academy did not exact tests or confessions of faith, neither is it reasonable to suppose that its bursaries would be granted to students who were, or who became, members of creed-bound churches. If they did subscribe to creeds they became, I believe, in the intention of those who founded the Academy, unfit to receive any help from the funds of the Institution. Absolute liberty of conscience was proclaimed by those who founded the Academy. This principle has been re-affirmed on many occasions by the College. The funds of an institution which professes liberty cannot with propriety be devoted to the training of those who repudiate the principle which is the source of all its strength.

The special cause which has given rise to the movement of which this meeting is the outcome is a case which has already been under the notice of the Committee, namely, that of a student, an external exhibitioner, who, after stating very frankly his intention of taking Anglican orders, decided that his best and most honourable course was to resign his exhibition with its accompanying benefits. The Committee, however, saw no reason why the exhibitioner in question should resign, but encouraged him to hold his bursary, and complete his full course at the expense of the College. The funds of a college which is supposed to be free of all tests and confessions of faith were to be devoted to the support of a student who had deliberately announced his intention of becoming a priest in a creed-bound church. Notwithstanding the resolution of the Committee the exhibitioner still thought it unwise to receive further pecuniary benefit from the College, a determination which, I think, was most praiseworthy and honourable on his part. He certainly took a clearer view of the position than did the Committee.

A number of the Trustees of the College took alarm at the action of the Committee in this particular case. Two deputations waited on the officers and Committee for the purpose of expressing their views on the subject.

The deputation which interviewed the Committee in Manchester in the month of April last expressed a hope that the uneasiness which had prompted the members of the deputation to seek some information with regard to the future policy of the Committee would be removed. When the deputation had withdrawn the Rev. C. J. Street moved that the resolution of the Committee of June 26, 1903, concerning the student who has been mentioned be not considered as a precedent.

An amendment was moved that the Committee did not desire to limit the freedom of themselves and their successors to decide all cases of renewals of grants to students on the merits of each particular case. This amendment was carried by a large majority.

The protesting Trustees thereupon decided to send in a requisition for a special meeting in order to bring the whole matter to the knowledge of their co-Trustees, and to test their opinion upon the questions at issue.

I now feel it my duty to refer to some of the criticisms which have been evoked by the notice of my resolution. I will first take the circular which was issued by most of the professors of Manchester College under date of October 13 last.

These gentlemen state that the Resolution I am now proposing, if passed, would affect very seriously the position of the College. They also state that it would unquestionably rebuke the principle of perfect freedom of mind and conscience in both teachers and taught which has always been maintained as fundamental. They also state that an attempt is being made to restrict the ancient liberties of the College, and that there is a desire to lower it from its old position of a public institution into a sectarian seminary.

Now, I must say that I have read these statements with astonishment and regret. Those who are acting with me have not the slightest desire to restrict the ancient liberties of the College, on the contrary, our desire is to keep them sacred and inviolate. We stand for the principle of perfect freedom of mind and conscience in both teachers and taught. We claim that the College is a Protestant Dissenting Institution. If not, what is it? It does not, certainly, belong to the Romish or Anglican Churches. It must, therefore, of necessity belong to that third great classification of our religious bodies generally known as Protestant Dissenters, unless we are to invent a new kind of body, which shall treat as indifferent the opposing principles of doctrinal subscription and doctrinal liberty.

The sturdy Protestant Dissenters who founded the Manchester Academy were in all respects as liberal in their ideas as their successors of the present day. They were not ashamed to call themselves Protestant Dissenters, and I cannot see why the re-affirming of the proposition that the successor to the Manchester Academy is a Protestant Dissenting Institution should give such alarm to anyone connected with the College.

I anticipate the reply to my argument on this subject. I shall be told that the College is not Roman Catholic, Anglican, or Protestant Dissenting; that it does not recognise the existence of any of these classifications, and is not connected with any of them. This reply might, under certain circumstances, be conclusive, but there is one little fact which rather militates against its effectiveness. Attached to Manchester College, Oxford, is a chapel. We are informed that daily morning religious service is held in that chapel; that all students are expected to attend regularly, but, in accordance with the fundamental principle of the College, they are not required to do so, but are free to follow their own conscientious preferences. Now, I beg to ask, what is the nature of the services held in the chapel of Manchester College, Oxford? If the services are not Romish or Anglican, then the chapel attached to Manchester Collge is, and has been from the first day of its use, to all intents and purposes a Protestant Dissenting place of worship, and it would seem that the College to which it is attached must of necessity be a Protestant Dissenting College.

I will now draw your attention to the joint circular issued by the Committee, members of the staff, and Visitors of the College, dated October 18. I learn in that circular that an amendment to the Resolution is to be proposed, according to the terms of which the Trustees are asked to declare that they will do nothing to limit for themselvess or their successors the freedom the College has inherited and enjoyed for nearly a century and a quarter. The protesting Trustees heartily concur in this portion of the amendment without agreeing with the Committee's views as to the nature of the freedom the College has inherited and enjoyed. They maintain that the freedom of the College has been limited by the action of the Committee in the case of the student to whom I have previously alluded. They consider that the case in question should not be regarded as a precedent, and that the Trustees should receive an assurance that no subsidies will in future under any circumstances be given, or be proposed to be given, to students who announce their intention of joining a creed-bound church, or who definitely express their belief in Ecclesiastical formulæ which all here consider to be of human invention.

The Committee in their circular allege that the Resolution might be twisted to exclude students from America, Hungary, India, and Japan. I certainly am surprised at such an interpretation being put upon any part of the proposed Resolution. If the students from America, Hungary, India, and Japan express their intention of becoming priests in a creed-bound church the Moving Trustees would certainly object to their being subsidised—nothing more.

The Committee and professors also state that the Presbyterians and Unitarians who mainly founded and supported the College have held to and maintained the open trust, and it would indeed be strange if the Trustees were now to attempt to impose a test.

I am not aware that the Protesting Trustees have ever advocated the imposition of any test whatsoever in the true sense of the word. They have never even hinted at the imposition of a doctrinal test. There is nothing in anything that has been said or written during the whole of this controversy which could be construed into a desire on their part to impose such a test in the College, and they most emphatically deny that the carrying of the proposed Resolution would lead to the impositon of a test or affect injuriously the principle of the open trust, which indeed is of the very essence of Protestant Dissent. It is unreasonable to speak of non-subscription as a test in connection with Manchester College.

The Committee state that there has not been, neither is there intended, any new departure, but the Moving Trustees do not agree with the Committee on this point. The proposition to continue to subsidise a student who has announced his intention of entering the Established Church is a new departure, unwarranted by any express sanction of the Trustees, and against such new departure the Moving Trustees vigorously protest.

They do not seek to exclude from the educational benefits of the College those who decide to enter the ministry of creed-bound churches, but they consider that the students should enjoy these benefits at their own expense, and not to the prejudice of those for whom the College was originally established.

I will now turn to the letter of the Principal of the College, which appeared in THE INQUIRER of the 5th inst. It is there stated that Mr. Oliver, a Church of England student, was in receipt of a bursary. Now, although the minutes and reports have been carefully searched, nothing has been found to indicate that Mr. Oliver was a declared Churchman, or that the Trustees or Committee know he intended to take Orders when they granted or continued his bursary. It is, therefore, impossible to judge whether there is any analogy between Mr. Oliver's case and that of the student which has been the cause of this special meeting. If a bursary was granted or continued to Mr. Oliver in spite of his declaration that he professed to belong to the Church of England, such a proceeding constituted, in the opinion of the Moving Trustees, a violation of the fundamental principles of the College.

I will now allude very briefly to a circular which was issued, independently, by an official of the College, dated November 1. The writer of the circular entreats the Trustees to attend and vote against this Resolution, alleging as his only excuse for issuing this circular his lifelong interest in Unitarianism generally, and Manchester College in particular.

Now, I beg to call the special attention of the Trustees to the fact that in the Resolution there is not the slightest allusion to Unitarianism. I am a Unitarian, and am proud to call myself by that name. But I stand before you to-day, not to plead the cause of Unitarianism, but that of Protestant Dissent, as my ancestor did before me; the cause of those who reject all creeds and confessions of faith drawn up by fallible men. The founders and first tutors of the Manchester Academy were far too liberal to establish an institution for the benefit of one class of Protestant Dissenters only; although, according to Sir Thomas Baker, Unitarianism was general in the Cross-street congregation, the claims of Unitarianism received no special consideration from them.

The allusion to Unitarianism on the part of some of the opponents of the Resolution betrays a conviction that Manchester College has, after all, become a Unitarian College more than anything else. It is certainly an institution whose bursaries an honest and conscientious creed-bound Trinitarian would hesitate to accept, had he studied carefully its origin and history.

I will now turn to the "Further Statement" of November 17, issued in support of the Committee's Amendment.

I find it there stated that the Rev. H. E. Dowson (who was a student on the foundation) was minded at one period during his college course to enter the Anglican Church. I was present at the meeting when Mr. Dowson made a statement on this subject, and listened most carefully to everything he said. His attitude, if I heard him rightly, was one of hesitation and doubt, But he never professed to belong to the Church of England, as Mr. Oliver did, neither did he state frankly his intention of taking Anglican Orders, as Mr. Holden did. It is unfair to institute any comparison between these cases. The circumstances seem to have been entirely different.

It is alleged by the authors of the "Further Statement" that the admission by the supporters of the motion of the "propriety of welcoming students preparing for the ministry of a Confessional Church, so long as they do not receive a bursary, deprives their argument of all logical consistency."

The writers of the paragraph did not perceive that in making the statement now quoted they were accusing the Founders and first tutors of want of logical consistency. Perhaps that does not matter. The Managers of the Academy did, as it has been shown, welcome students preparing for the ministry of Confessional Churches, and gave them such general instruction as the Academy could afford, but such instruction could not include the special preparation necessary for the ministry of any particular Confessional Church. Moreover, the said students came at their own expense. Had they applied for bursaries the question would have concerned the Committee, who could not have granted the required assistance without breaking faith with those by whom the funds were contributed.

And now, in conclusion, I beg to recall a passage from Dr. Barnes's sermon preached at the inauguration of the Academy, which the Committee and Professors think not unworthy of to-day:—

It is of unspeakable importance to the interests of religion (said Dr. Barnes) that those who are to be the assertors of its truth shall study its doctrines free from the control of human decision and authority.

Now, we are told by the Principal, that Mr. Oliver, a student who professed to belong to the Church of England, was in receipt of a bursary. We are aware that the Committee would admit (and, we suppose, grant bursaries to) students who definitely applied with a view to becoming clergymen in the Church of England. Can such students already pledged to creed-bound churches be said to study the doctrines of religion free from the control of human decision and authority? There can only be one answer to this question—an emphatic "No."

The Committee are of opinion, if their late Secretary and present Chairman correctly interprets them, that there is unshackled freedom for all students at the College, whether in receipt of bursaries or not, not only to be Trinitarian in opinion, but also to have made up their minds to sign a Trinitarian creed. The Protesting Trustees are not agreed with them on this point.

I now beg to move the resolution of which notice has been given.

Mr. Dowson's Letter.

At the request of Mr. Harrison, Mr. Worthington then read Mr. Holden's letter of June 7, 1903, resigning his bursary as an external student of the College on the ground that he intended to enter the ministry of the Church of England, and the resolution of the Committee thereon. Mr. Harrison also read the letter of the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, then secretary of the College, conveying the Committee's resolution to Mr. Holden, a copy of which was in his possession; Mr. Worthington having first said that if any Trustee had the letter he was at liberty to read it to the meeting, so far as Mr. Dowson was concerned. The following was Mr. Dowson's letter:—

DEAR MR. HOLDEN,—I am instructed by the Committee to convey to you their sense of the honourable manner in which you have acquainted them with the change in your opinions and in your intention as to the Church in which you expect to minister. They also take note of your request to be allowed to resign your exhibition, and of your promise to repay the £100 already received. Of course, if you really desire on your own account, under the altered conditions, to study elsewhere than at Manchester College for the assumption of orders in the Church of England, the Committee will release you from the obligations you incurred to fulfil your course. But I am requested to assure you that from the point of view of the College, any student entirely meets the conditions on which his exhibition is held who enters the ministry in any religious denomination. The liberty of choice extended to him is absolute. There is nothing whatever to prevent him becoming a clergyman in the Church of England. The College, indeed, would admit a student who definitely applied with a view to becoming a clergyman in the Church of England. One such is corresponding with me now, and I have favoured his application, and on a previous occasion another, with the same intention, was encouraged to apply, although he did not come. It rests entirely with you. The Committee have a high opinion of your character as a man of honour, and will be very glad to continue your exhibition, and to see you enter and fulfil the theological course. Manchester College is not a Unitarian college. Nor is it a college in which it is laid down that non-subscription of articles or creeds by students, when they subsequently enter the ministry, would be a breach of the condition on which the exhibitions are held. There is unshackled freedom, not only to be Trinitarian in opinion, but to sign a Trinitarian creed, if conscience directs. Hoping you will see your way to reconsider your resignation of your exhibition, and with best wishes, I am yours sincerely, H. ENFIELD DOWSON.

Rev. W. G. Tarrant.

The Rev. W. G. TARRANT seconded the resolution. The first question which arose was, he said, as to the propriety of having any such motion before them at all; whether a College or Institution admitted to be on an open principle could fairly be defined in any declaratory resolution such as that. They must all agree that if there was a trust it was a trust for something. That College and its emoluments and possessions were not a free gift to anybody with no conditions. They had received that trust, and he should try to show from the evidence he had been able to find what had been understood to be the nature of the trust which the College stood to represent. As to whether the view expressed in the motion was the proper view, depended on that evidence, and he was free to confess that the evidence was conflicting. He was the freer to do so because in the "Further Statement" to which allusion had been made they found it said as follows:—

Reading the whole story of the College from its foundation to the present day, while it may be conceded that now and then there have been isolated acts and declarations which are not quite consistent with the views here commended, the whole tendency and the repeated declarations of its spokesmen have been against the imposition by the College of tests of any kind.

For his own part, on the evidence, he thought, the whole scope, the whole tendency, and the repeated declarations were entirely in favour of the view represented in the motion he had the honour to second. He found four types of evidence to supplement what had been said by Mr. Harrison. First he took the statements made from time to time by individuals, of course on their individual responsibility often, but nevertheless they being individuals of high responsibility, their statements were worth a good deal. In reference to the Rev. Charles Wellbeloved in 1803 it was stated that he was a person well qualified to conduct the education of young men for the sacred ministry among Protestant Dissenters. That was the ground upon which he was chosen to serve the College. In 1853, half a century later, the Rev. Charles Wellbeloved and the Rev. John Kenrick, in a joint affidavit stated again "that the object of the Trustees and contributors was solely the advantage of Protestant Dissenters conscientiously refusing subscription to Creeds." A regulation for admission of students in June, 1810, stated "that no candidate shall in future be admitted to this Institution as a Divinity Student but on the recommendation of three Protestant Dissenting Ministers.'' That regulation was in force for the greater part of the last century, and he thought they must allow that those who were managing the College, and who knew that was a condition imperative on all students, knew what they were about during that period of seventy years. They knew what the College was for, and in their mind that seemed to express what it really represented. Then, again, the certificate on leaving (in 1846) was as follows:—that so-and-so "was enrolled a Divinity Student on the foundation of the Manchester New College" at a certain time, "and went through the usual course of study in preparation for the Christian Ministry amongst Protestant Dissenters, in conformity with the rules of the College.'' He did not know when that form of certificate was altered, or by whose authority, though quite possibly authority could be found. He then quoted the opening sentence of Dr. Martineau's address on the opening of the College in 1874:—

> The College which places me here to-day professes to select and qualify suitable men for the Nonconformist ministry; that is, headship of societies voluntarily formed for the promotion of the Christian life.

Many such declarations were to be found in the various addresses from time to time, and while he frankly admitted that sometimes observations were to be found of a different tenour, when they heard responsible men from time to time speaking like that they must attach great importance to what they said.

The second type of evidence he would cite was that of formal declarations by responsible bodies of friends or Trustees of the College. In the year 1839 there was an appeal to the House of Lords in connection with the Lady Hewley case: The "Grand Trustees" made their answer and stated "that the College is an establishment chiefly supported by persons who call themselves Presbyterian Dissenters, and is for the purpose of educating Ministers of that Denomination.'' That was in 1839. In 1853 the emphasis was laid again and again in the Petition of Trustees on the question of removing the College from Manchester to London, upon the importance of the principle that the Trust was for Protestant Dissenters; and again in 1857 there was the resolution passed at the special meeting of Trustees on the appointment of Mr. Martineau. Mr. R. N. Philips seconded what Mr. Edwin Field proposed, namely:—

> That this institution is founded for the sole purpose of giving University learning to students for the Christian ministry among non-subscribing Dissenters without test or confession of faith, and not for the purpose of instruction in the peculiar doctrines of any sect, and that in appointing professors it would be a violation of the fundamental principle to attempt to secure a representative of the views of any particular school of thought.

The latter part, of course, had special reference to the question which was then agitating the minds of the Trustees; the former part seemed to him to be quite conclusive. As to the usage of the College, he asked, what was the case with regard to the professors? If that was a free school for professors to come to from all quarters, unlimited by any particular condition as to their freedom to accept truth and to teach truth, how was it that the singular fact emerged which they saw as they looked upon the rule of the professors? All the professors of Theology, of Moral Philosophy, and of Ecclesiastical History had been Protestant Dissenters from the beginning until now; all the Tate Lecturers, gentlemen who had been selected for the purpose specially of opening the minds of the students, to the right way of going about their pastorial functions—all these had been selected not because of their eminence in the Christian world at large, or because of their special experience in regard to these things, but because they had within a certain narrow range numerically of churches been found suitable to come to speak to the students of the college who were likely to enter the same churches. They had all been ministers of the Free Churches. No Conforming clergyman had ever been admitted to a professorship of that College. The case of one conforming clergyman, the Rev. Charles Sanders, to be appointed to a literary professorship, was mentioned in the Historical Statement, and surely they must be blind if they did not see the anxiety of the earlier workers of that Institution that he, being a Conformist, should not have anything to do with the vital work of the Institution—viz., preparing ministers for their sacred calling. Dr. Martineau in his Centenary Address observed that such was not the practice with regard to the teaching staff. He said:—

> If you ask me how comes it, then, that with this sublime impartiality you always alight on heterodox professors, my chief and sufficient answer is this, that though our rule has no quarrel with any doctrine called orthodox, the orthodox doctrines have a quarrel with our rule, the very idea of an orthodoxy or set form of theological conceptions, as essential to Divine acceptance, being a direct denial of all permissible variation. We must have men that are just and patient towards diversities of thought, and to be so is to have removed already the very form of an authoritative orthodoxy.

Dr. Martineau, they all knew, once thought that Bishop Colenso would have been a very suitable professor, and a quotation from Dr. Martineau's expressions on the subject appeared in last week's INQUIRER, but he ventured to say that Dr. Martineau expressed himself in other words under other conditions, and he had moreover a quotation from a letter by the Rev. John Hamilton Thom which he thought had a very intimate bearing upon the question they were trying to decide. On January 17, 1875, Dr. Martineau wrote to Mr. Thom:—

> The important point for us, however, is this: whether our College is committed by its fundamental principle to disown all people who give this answer (the Broad Church one) rather than yours and mine to the problem of Conformity. What is that principle? To require from the professors the free exercise of a competent mind and the conscientious communication of its best light; and, in furtherance of this end, to abstain from prescribing beforehand, to him or his pupils, any results which they must reach. This principle certainly shows our conviction that tests are apt to hinder free learning, and ought not to stand in its way, and makes it imperative on us to elect no professor without adequate guarantees for the free and conscientious action of his mind.

Mr. Thom wrote on March 17, 1875, to Dr. Martineau:—

> There would have been no indisposition on the part of Manchester New College to give a Theological Chair to Dr. Colenso if he had come out from the Church of England. As long as he remains under dogmatic obligations we could not consistently ask him to connect himself with a college of which the fundamental principle is free learning and free teaching, and it certainly does not lighten this difficulty or render him a person to be set up before our students for honour and imitation in his understanding of the sacrifices that are due to Truth and Freedom, to have it hinted that he does not believe the doctrines by which he appears to the world to be ecclesiastically bound.

As to a beneficed clergyman, he understood that Dr. Drummond himself admitted that objection might fairly be made, not on the ground of opinion, but because he would be subject to an outside authority which might call him to account for opinions expressed in the College class-room. Some of them thought the objection not only fair but imperative, and he recalled the objection made in the case of the Rev. John Owen, when he gave an opening address in the College. Thus it seemed there was a line to be drawn. Or did they stand simply for the chance opinion of the majority of the Trustees from time to time? A trust must be for something, and he thought the evidence which had been cited was of the greatest importance. But he should not himself like to go to law in view of something he saw in the Lord Chancellor's judgment in the Lady Hewley case in 1839, who declared that upon a careful examination of the evidence he must consider that, so far as related to the education for the ministry, "Manchester College is substantially an Unitarian establishment." "Now, Heaven forbid," Mr. Tarrant concluded, "that we should go to law."

The Committee's Amendment.

Mr. RUSSELL SCOTT moved the following amendment, of which notice had been given, on behalf of the Committee:—

> That, inasmuch as the only judicial decision of the Rolls Court in 1853 was to the effect that the Trustees had power to remove the Institution to such place as, in the opinion of the majority of the Trustees, should be best calculated to advance the object and design of the Institution;
> And, as the College has always adhered to its "original principle of freely imparting theological knowledge without insisting on the adoption of particular theological doctrines";
> And, as the founders unanimously declared that "the Institution will be opened to young men of every religious denomination, from whom no test or confession of faith will be required," and also that "this Academy is founded upon the most liberal principles, and will be open to young men of all denominations and professions";
> And, as the College property and funds are held upon absolutely free and open trusts;
> It is hereby declared that the College adheres to these fundamental principles, and the Trustees will do nothing to limit for themselves and their successors the freedom the College has inherited and has enjoyed for nearly a century and a quarter.

That amendment, Mr. Scott said, expressed most completely the feeling he had with regard to the College, and he very greatly regretted (he thought many of them regretted) that that controversy had ever arisen. He thought it had been created on wholly inadequate grounds, and had arisen from a fundamental misconception of the principle of the College. He had hoped that after Dr. Drummond's letter with regard to the case of Mr. Holden and the position of Mr. Addis, the discussion would drop, but that had not been the case. The resolution put before them declared "that the historical principle of the College is that it is a non-subscribing Protestant Dissenting Institution." But that was not so much a description of the principle of the College as a statement of what are the historical facts connected with it. There was no doubt (it had not been disputed by anyone on either side) that the College was founded by Dissenters, that it had been maintained by Dissenters, that the main purpose of it was the education of Dissenters for the Dissenting Ministry. Those things were all common facts which they all admitted, but those facts are not principles. They had no right to say that the fact that the College had been subscribed to by Protestant Dissenters was a principle any more than the fact that that building was built by a Dissenting architect. Neither of them implied necessarily any principle at all. The principle of that College was not that it was founded by Dissenters or that it was founded to educate Dissenting Ministers, its principle was Catholicity, as opposed to Sectarianism of any sort or kind. That was the guiding principle, and it was the historical principle of the College. It is no principle at all to say that it was founded by Dissenters, or maintained by Dissenters, or that it was mainly instituted to educate Dissenters. A college of that kind might be as narrow as they pleased or as free; those were merely historical facts and incidents, and not principles. If they wanted to know what the principle of the College is, they ought to turn to the statement of the Founders in the early days of the College. They had been referred to already, and extracts had been given from them. He should like to read one extract, which seemed to him to admit of no dispute as to its meaning or as to its scope. It was from Dr. Barnes' discourse, on Sept. 14, 1786. Dr. Barnes said:—

> Yours is not the cause of any party. You rank yourselves under no distinguishing name. The liberty which you claim for yourselves you extend with equal latitude to others. The burden to which you will not submit, you will never impose. You plead for the equal universal dominion of reason, of conscience, and of truth. To these great interests alone you consecrate this Seminary.

If in any annual report of that College they had made a statement like that—not in those exact words, but with that sentiment and that feeling, and then said: "To these great interests alone you consecrate this College," he thought they would have been told that they had got "a waning hold" upon the fact that the College was intended to educate the Dissenting Ministry. "That," Mr. Scott concluded, "is the fundamental difference between us. We say that this College is absolutely free, absolutely catholic, and that although it is here for the main purpose of educating—which I think we must all admit has been its main purpose and its primary object—to educate men for the Dissenting Ministry—for the Free Churches, that is only one object; and there is nothing in that object to contradict the scope and principle of absolute freedom and absolute catholicity which it was the intention of the Founders of this College to establish in it."

Mr. A. H. Worthington.

Mr. A. H. WORTHINGTON seconded the amendment. The main issue placed before them, he said, might not unfairly be put in this way: Are we to search the records of the history of the College to see if we can find a narrowing principle which will suit our opinions of the present day, or are we, with an open mind in the spirit of truth, and with all liberty, to search for the main principles of our Founders whom we sometimes forget and of our administrators of the last century and a quarter? I am not afraid of this test. If we search for limitations from this man's address or from that particular Trustees' Meeting, or from this letter or from this resolution, in 120 years is it surprising that we can find a few? I am amazed that in searching the past 120 years we do not find more limitations, more narrowing, that our men have always been, broadly speaking, on the free side and the open side. And having searched, not for limitations, but for broadening out, if in 120 years we have advanced something as a College, is that to our discredit?

Turning to the legal position, he said it might be rather dangerous to do so, but he was not afraid of it. He went further and said that in looking through the records of the past, their foundation and history, and their declarations from time to time, with friends whose judgment he trusted as much as his own, they had come to the conclusion of their own motion that the legal position of the amendment and of the original Founders was absolutely safe. But distrusting his own judgment and even the judgment of his legal friends, he had of his own motion, without consulting them or the Committee, taken the opinion on that question of the man whom he believed to be the highest authority in the land on such a question, one who was particularly conversant with such matters, in which he was at the very head of the Chancery Bar—the Right Hon. Mr. Haldane, K.C. He had not put an ex parte statement before Mr. Haldane. He had put before him every piece of literature on the opposite side, the pamphlets, the letters, whatever he could get hold of, and also the literature on the amendment side, up to the point when the case was submitted. He put the points on both sides as fairly as he could, and asked not for an opinion on this side or the other, but to know where the College really stood.

Mr. Worthington then read Mr. Haldane's opinion, which was decisively that the College was based on an all-embracing liberty according to the unanimous declaration of the Founders that "the Institution will be open to young men of every religious denomination, from whom no test or confession of faith will be required." Thus, not only the College itself, but all its emoluments were unrestricted, and it was clearly right that students for the ministry in the Church of England, as for any other ministry, should be admitted. There, Mr. Worthington said, he would leave the legal argument and come to one or two points in the history of the College. Some of the things that had been said and written in that controversy seemed to point to a desire to tie down the present by the past. And he continued:—

Now, in so far as our Founders have tied down the present by the past, so far as this College is concerned we cannot help it; but, fortunately for us (and that is the very reason why we still exist as we are), they tied it down on the very broadest possible basis; but even in the administration of the College I beg the Trustees, the Committee (it is not necessary to beg the Professors) not to go searching after precedents for this or that action. Take your free trust in your hand, look at the individual circumstances of cases that come before you, and with your staff of Professors—I venture to say even with your Committee—you will not go very far wrong. If your Committee go farther than you think right in any particular direction, as Mr. Jones has so well pointed out, you have your remedy. If you think you can elect a better body of men to observe the conditions of this Trust, and to carry out the administration of the College, you are always at liberty to do so; but whatever you do, never attempt, if I may venture to plead—never attempt by resolution even of Committee, still less of Trustees, to bind down your successors so as to hamper the freedom which they have inherited. Historical statements not in the historical atmosphere, but in the polemic atmosphere of controversy, are sometimes a little misleading. I confess I think the recent "historical statement" which has been issued on behalf of forty-five Trustees is, though I commend its care, its accuracy, and its ability, misleading if it is to be taken as a complete historical statement of the history of the College. The dry light of history would edit some of those statements; would complete them; would add something here and there which I venture to say to an open-minded Trustee or outsider would convey a different impression than the "historical statement" to which I refer. I do not quarrel for one moment with the statement. I think, seeing that it is polemic, it is singularly fair in many respects. I am only astounded that the principal things in that statement did not convert everyone of those on whose side it is put forward. I find much more in that statement in favour of the amendment than I find in favour of the resolution. If I might venture to summarise the history of the College, I would say this—that it practically amounts to an institution that is free-born, with a great Magna Charta in these 1786 resolutions—that has lived free, and (if I might prophesy) that will continue to live free. Always on great occasions the College has declared on the side of freedom, sometimes with some hesitation, sometimes whole-heartedly. Do not let us look out for limitations, as others on all sides of us are broadening. Why, there are universities founding free faculties. Are we who saw 120 years ahead of the leaders of the present day going to surrender our free faculty—our freedom—just at the time when the world is waking up to the fact that that is the only basis on which you can have the study of theology like any other science? If you do so, I venture again to prophesy, and I think I shall have a good many men who will prophesy with me in this matter—if you do that, and (at the very time when others are broadening) seek, and begin, to narrow, the trend of liberal religious thought of the present day will sweep right past Manchester College and leave it in a backwater.

And to come to one other point. What do the Trustees who have promoted this resolution fear? Freedom? No, they cannot.

A TRUSTEE: No, certainly not.

Mr. WORTHINGTON: No. That there is going to be some great departure? Where is the evidence? We have only in a recent case of a student followed precedent; I would have done it if we had not had any precedent, but we have only followed precedent. What are we going to do that is so very dreadful? You know your teaching staff. You know your Committee. Consider their names. Consider their ancestry. Consider what is in their very blood, what is in their inherited traditions. Are they going to take this College and crumple it up and start it as an Anglican Institution? What is it that people are afraid of? I will tell you what I think it is—and I will be perfectly frank in this matter—I think it is this—that they are not afraid that we are going to do anything that is contrary to the great principles of the College, but they would like to see this College turned into something different from what it is.

Several TRUSTEES: No, no, no!

Mr. WORTHINGTON: I believe there are some behind this agitation who take that view.

A TRUSTEE: No.

Mr. WORTHINGTON: I may be wrong. If that is not so, then I appeal, even at this late date, to those forty-five and the others who are here with them to support the resolution, to vote in favour of the amendment. Seeing that you can be free on the highest authority, seeing that you are free, remain free. Make this declaration which we ask you to do to-day. It is no new declaration. It is a quotation from your foundation deed; it is a quotation from your historical principle; there is nothing new from the first word to the last, make it and be free to shape your own course in the future in the atmosphere of freedom. Mr. Worthington at this point read a letter from the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, expressing his deep regret that he could not be present and his earnest support of the amendment, and then said in conclusion:—There is room for difference of opinion in the atmosphere of freedom; there is no room for difference of opinion in any other atmosphere. And surely if we are not all of one mind on the particular point, we can prevent dividing hopelessly on the question that is now before us into camps: having had our "say" and taken our vote we can cry "Peace." All I plead for is that the College motto, "To truth, to liberty, to religion," shall not be edited; least of all that you should not try to substitute for these three great affirmations negations which do not even go to the vitals of religion. Free and open you have received your trust, free it must remain in spite of all you do. Accept it as it is. Do not attempt to shackle truth, to shackle liberty, to promote religion in an atmosphere of shackled truth and shackled liberty. Leave it to succeeding generations to work out their own problems as you have been left in the past to work out yours.

The meeting then adjourned for half an hour for lunch, after which Mr. A. H. WORTHINGTON read the letters to which he referred at the opening of the meeting, a letter from Mr. Charles W. Jones, the Treasurer, who was prevented, by the illness of Mrs. Jones, from being present; a letter from Mr. David Ainsworth, who was kept away by his own illness (both strongly in support of the amendment), and a letter from the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, one of the Visitors of the College, which was as follows:—

Mr. Armstrong's Letter.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT,—It is a heartfelt grief to me that a slight, but incapacitating, attack of illness makes my attendance at Oxford to-morrow entirely out of the question.

I cannot use voice or vote in to-morrow's councils. May I send a few brief and earnest suggestions, and, I will say, affectionate exhortations, at a moment that touches to the quick nerves of thought and action in many of us, life-bound to the College, that lie deep in the sanctuaries of character?

My pen moves but dully, and I will be short.

(1) I pray that you in your own office may have strength to hold the whole body of Trustees to the clear issues raised, and to discourage, and, so far as you lawfully can, disallow new or subtly modified issues, or any issues offered in the hope of attaching or detaching votes on one side or the other. Both sides have explained to us, in an enormous literature, what they desire to achieve or to prevent. We have a right to a vote to-morrow directly disallowing or otherwise the competing claims.

(2) May God save our College to-morrow from personalities, recriminations, or sharp temper. The Trustees will need that high, clear vision in discriminating thoughts and principles and ideals which we imperfect men but rarely rise to. They have solemn commission for the unborn age. They must be in the Spirit on that Lord's day. Acts and words and twists of expression have, in my view, gone forth in this controversy which were unhappy, and that not on one side alone. These faults of the brethren must be put wholly out of mind.

(3) Our forefathers in the great days of old created a college. Probably the main actuating Purpose was that there might be a place of free education both for divines and seculars from which, as part of the whole scheme, there might happily issue, amongst others, men equipped for the ministry of those most noble institutions, the Free Non-Subscribing Congregations. That took an infinitely important and prevailing place in the Purpose.

But our Fathers were men who, if they held a Purpose, must always think out the Principle consonant with the Purpose. So they laid down their Principle—equal qualification, rights, opportunities, &c., to all, no tests, free teaching and free learning. From the very first, there we have Purpose and Principle side by side. He who now impairs either is false to the College.

Personally, I have always held a very deep and affectionate interest in the Purpose; probably I have been even more keen for the College because it is an institution from which we may get men trained well for our Free Churches, than even for its noble and stately Principle. My heart is in our Churches. More of my life is in them than in our College. But I see with overwhelming clearness that the Principle of the College may not be impaired by a scintilla. And my whole soul goes out in pride at the thought of our Principle.

That noble principle of Non-Subscription only rises to its own greatest elevation and stateliness when we can embrace in a perfect charity the man who fails to realise or understand it.

(4) If a Principle so sacred and yet so subtle as this is to be preserved in an institution, how can that be brought about? By rules and definitions, or proposed declarations, whenever some trustee may think that some appointment shall have been unadvised? No; that means the rapid accumulation of precedents and regulations under which this freedom intended to be preserved would be quickly stabbed to death. You cannot foresee what may be wise in a particular case five years hence, the minute personal nuances. You must leave things open. The case is too sensitive to be left to the mechanical action of the by-laws or the stated qualification. In the high honour, wisdom, and perspicuity of men of high and God-fearing life, lies our only refuge.

Old fellow-students and trustees assembled from far and wide, be it your one resolve to-morrow to leave your administrators free.—In all fraternal sympathy,

RICHARD A. ARMSTRONG.

Liverpool, Nov. 28.

A letter from the Rev. Stopford Brooke, received by the Rev. Henry Gow, one of the secretaries of the College, and which he was unable, owing to lack of time, to read to the meeting, we take the liberty of introducing here:—

Mr. Stopford Brooke's Letter.

DEAR MR. GOW,—I presume that as a subscriber to Manchester College I have the right to address you on the question which is to be discussed on Tuesday next at the meeting of the Trustees.

I have no hesitation in saying what side I should take or what vote I should give. I should take the side which the body of the Professors of the College and the Principal have taken; and I should vote against the resolution put forward by the forty-five Trustees who have signed the Requisition.

I should do this with the strongest conviction that they are wrong in limiting to any section of the Christian Church the use and teaching of the College, and especially wrong in binding it down by any rules or restrictions which would hamper or prevent its expansion and development—such expansion and development as the future, in the progress of thought, will certainly first suggest and then demand. At present, in harmony with the principles on which, up to this moment, I understood it was managed, the College can, with open arms, meet such changes in religious thought and expand with them. But if this resolution were to pass it would then, when these inevitable changes arrive, feel bitterly the limitations which the present resolution will, if it be carried, have imposed upon it, and either be forced to undo them or to lag behind that progress towards a higher conception of worship and union among religious bodies to which so many of us look forward with faith and hope.

Again, in its main principle of the open door, unguarded by sentinel tests—in its readiness to welcome to its teaching young men of all religions under the sun who desired to seek and find truth; in its declaration that there were spiritual truths in belief of which all men could be at one; and that creeds, confessions, and sect opinions were before God, and ought to be before man, indifferent—Manchester College held up before us the image and ideal of that future universal religion within whose great circle all religions might, while retaining their special forms, find a high union and refuge, and meet now and again to worship together God the Father, and to realise their unity in one Brotherhood.

This, we understood, was the principle on which Manchester College was worked, this the ideal it strove to represent. It was to promote this that many of us subscribed and laboured. We loved it because it looked forward beyond the special form of religious thought it cherished to the higher form which the future will reveal, and prepared its practice to be able to receive that form. We were naturally proud of its unique freedom, among other theological Colleges in Great Britain, from all tests and limitations, and of its open reception of all who wished to teach within it or to be taught. In that matter the College stands alone—a city set on a hill—in the hope that it may not always remain alone.

This is what many of us thought; and we cherished this ideal and the College which represented it. But if this resolution should be carried, all this ideal will cease to be represented, and all the hopes we have founded on its representation will no longer be connected with Manchester College. It will sink down from its universal to a particular position.—I am, most sincerely yours,

STOPFORD A. BROOKE.

1, Manchester-square, W., Nov. 24.

Dr. Drummond.

The Rev. Dr. DRUMMOND, Principal of the College, then spoke, in answer to the President's call, and having referred to the suggestion of an old friend, which he had received, that it might be well for him to assure the Trustees of the Professors' undiminished interest in their students, and in the welfare of their own Churches, said that he felt it a humiliation to have to meet any such misgivings as that suggestion implied. He would assure every Trustee who had any misgivings of the kind that, according to the best of his belief, what they regarded as the primary, or even the exclusive work of the College, was never attended to with greater fidelity and greater earnestness than at the present moment. He then continued:—

Now, I should like to say a word, if you will give me your attention, as to the religious meaning and bearing of our own principle of free teaching and free learning of Theology. That seems to me to rise far above all questions of mere historical tradition or of mere legal obligation, and if it were the case, as I believe it is not, that we were bound by law to serve exclusively any single sect, we ought to promote a Bill in Parliament to relieve us from a disability which is so entirely opposed to all the highest and the best tendencies of our day. As I look back over the past a form comes before me—a face radiant with a heavenly glory—and I hear a voice speaking to me, saying, "I am the Spirit of grace and truth, and I have put you Professors in this College that you may serve my behests; when you sit down to prepare your courses of lectures enter into your private chamber, and when you have shut out the noise of the world, seek to gather yourselves in prayer the hallowed consciousness of the Divine Presence, and then, refusing to listen for a moment to any plea of party or of self-seeking, try alone, reverencing and seeking earnestly for all the evidence which you can collect, try to give a just judgment, and remember that a just judgment can be given only when you depend simply upon the will of Him that sent you; and when you enter your lecture-room, enter it as into a holy shrine, and with all the consciousness of your own infirmity and shortcoming and your fallibility, reverence the conscience which though young, has its own Divine leadings to guide it; reverence the intellect which though still untrained yet must spread its aspiring wings and follow its own beacon light in heaven." This is the voice which comes to me from the past of our college, and I believe that every trustee here, not excepting the most earnest supporter of the resolution, will follow me thus far; but it seems to me that to carry out this principle loyally it necessitates an absolutely open and public foundation. The principle of Non-conformity and Non-subscription is, I admit, and even maintain, when presented simply by itself an unsectarian principle, but the moment you begin to apply it as a test you make it sectarian. That, I believe, is the whole point of difference between us, and it seems to me absolutely impossible that if this resolution is passed, you can refrain from applying term by term an actual test to your students to know whether they are genuine Nonconformists or not. Now I am myself a Nonconformist to the backbone, and as a part of my Nonconformity I will impose no test upon any other man, not even the "no-creed" test. And I may remind you that the very resolution passed in 1857, which has been brought forward in the resolution of to-day, was objected to at that time by Mr. Avison on that precise ground. The whole tone and tendency of that meeting, as of all meetings of Trustees I think, has been in favour of liberty on the one point which was before them, but when this resolution was brought forward, Mr. Avison got up and pointed out that this might be used in the future as a "no-creed" test, and to this he strongly objected. No answer is given to this, and I presume at the time it was thought utterly impossible that it ever could be used in this way, so that very little notice was taken of it; and now the danger has actually come. It is on that ground that we oppose the resolution.

I think I may furnish an example which might possibly bring conviction to some minds. We are not the only College that is founded mainly in the Nonconformist interest. University College in 1828 was founded because the older Universities were closed against Dissenters; and no doubt the very main object in the minds of the founders of the institution was to provide one that could give University education of the day to Dissenters. But what did they do in founding such a College? They made it absolutely open. Its principle was that it would impose no test, either ecclesiastical or credal. And what would you say, gentlemen, if at this day they ruled out all the members of the Church of England? Would you consider that a public institution which was really open, and unpledged? I understand my time has elapsed. And I will only ask you this day to choose with open eye whom you will serve: the Eternal Spirit of truth or a sect—though it may claim to be the widest and the most enlightened of all sects, still a sect and not God? As for me and my colleagues we feel that whatever happens we must serve God alone, and will not bow down to any idol which might draw off our allegiance from Him or cause us to close our minds against any of the great vital questions of our day.

Rev. C. J. Street.

The Rev. C. J. STREET said that whatever resolution they might pass that day would bind no one but the present body of Trustees for the time being, and it would be quite possible to reverse it within the next twelve months if the Trustees thought it necessary. It was impossible in ten minutes to go through the amendment which was before them. It might seem a bold thing in the face of the legal opinion which had been given them to say anything on the first point of the amendment, but all the same he was emboldened to express his own view even against Mr. Haldane, from the fact that Mr. Haldane was the counsel for the United Free Church, which lost its case—which showed that lawyers were not always right. They might, therefore, be entitled to take their own course, no matter what Mr. Haldane's opinion might be. Claiming some little legal knowledge, though he did not profess to be a lawyer, Mr. Street said that he had not the slightest fear of bringing that matter before an impartial and authoritative judicial tribunal. They did not want to do it, but some time or other it might be forced upon them—they hoped it never would. They were quite willing to respond to the invitation put forward in the last INQUIRER, if the members of the committee were also willing to refer the whole matter to some judicial arbitration which they could all accept, and be guided by the decision in it without going into the public Law Courts at all; but meanwhile they had that "legal opinion," as they called it, of the Master of the Rolls—"decision" as he himself called it—to guide them. Mr. Street then went into the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in 1853, and gave it as his opinion that the Judge's declaration as to the purpose of the College had all the force of a specific judgment, which it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to upset. Next in the amendment, he said, they came to the statement, which none of them dissented from, that the College has always adhered to its "original principle of freely imparting theological knowledge without insisting on the adoption of particular theological doctrine." And he continued:—We all agree to that; but it is very interesting, Mr. Chairman, to find historically when that statement was first introduced, and by whom. It was introduced for the first time in 1854, the year after the decision of the Master of the Rolls, three years before that resolution was passed which we had quoted in ours, binding the College down to the principle, namely, "the sole purpose of giving University learning to students for the Christian ministry among non-subscribing Dissenters without test or Confession of Faith." So that the men who were responsible for approving of the Master of the Rolls' decision and who were responsible for carrying this resolution at the Trustees' meeting were also the men who were responsible for issuing that clause which appears, we are glad to see upon our Report year by year, and which we are all thoroughly agreed to, and it shows the spirit of those who do it, when we understand the historical relation.

Of course it is impossible, Sir, to put before this meeting, as one desires it should be put. the clear historical view of what was intended by the founders, but after a most careful study, my view of the matter is this—and I can substantiate it by a great deal of evidence—that the original purposes in their minds were, first of all, that there should be a full and systematic course of education for divines for the Protestant Dissenting Ministry, and that alone; and that, secondly, there should be preparatory instruction of youths of any creed for the other learned professions; and if you read your history carefully, you will find this borne out again and again; you will find that the original founders themselves said it in one of their resolutions—in one of their reports—a printed report which was issued by the Committee.

Mr. Street was proceeding when the time limit was reached.

Rev. P. H. Wicksteed.

The Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED, who was the next speaker, said they had the legal interpretation of Mr. Haldane, and the legal interpretation of Mr. Street, and it would be presumptuous for him to intervene. He was very much impressed by Mr. Street's remark that anything they might do that day would be in no degree binding, and his remark immediately afterwards about the binding declarations which were made in 1853 and 1857. It was exactly an instance of how such things went. They made resolutions which were not binding, and they stood there and bound everybody as soon as hands became strong enough to bind people with them. If it were not to be binding the whole matter became merely a question of administration, and why not treat it as a matter of administration from the beginning. Mr. Tarrant said a line must be drawn. Then let them draw it and not leave it to a chance majority in the future. Not leave it to a chance majority? Where would their chapels be—where would the college be—where would anything be if things had not been left to what they might call, if they liked, a chance majority? He did not know what kind of majority the mover and seconder of the resolution hope to get there, but he supposed something other than a chance majority which was to bind all chance majorities in the future. We are told to-day (Mr. Wicksteed continued) that we are to draw the line, and that in the name of Nonconformity and Non-subscription. In the name of Nonconformity and Non-subscription draw the line and protect yourself against a chance majority in the future. Now this, as it appears to me, is actually what we are asked to do, and my great comfort is that we have the highest—or nearly the highest—legal opinion to the effect that we cannot do it. Then what is the use of this attempt to bind the future, which we all of us say we do not want to do, and many of us say we cannot do? The matter is a matter of administration, and as such it ought to be considered. Questions of administration in which questions of principle are involved are always turning up. You must not attempt to define the application but define the principles or the principles evade you, and you get a legal formula. I distinguish between purpose and principle. Many of us may subscribe to chapels for the purpose of having worship conforming to our own views near to us that we may go to, and we may do all kind of things with perfectly reputable purpose, but those purposes do not limit our principles; and that is the whole question of entering so minutely into the purposes of the original founders. So far as they are binding we cannot help it, but this scrupulous desire to look into the purposes of the original founders and then to make declarations which shall draw the line for posterity, seems to me such a strangely unaccustomed "atmosphere that I hardly know the company and place in which they are brought forward. It was a question of administration, Mr. Wicksteed repeated, and as such the question must constantly arise. So it was with the case of Mr. Addis and of Mr. Holden. Let us accept the situation, he concluded; let us accept our freedom, and accept it with both hands.

Rev. J. E. Carpenter.

Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER then spoke as follows:—The question before us has a great many aspects, and I shall be obliged in curtailing my remarks within ten minutes to give you only the heads of a speech. No one doubts that the College was founded by English Presbyterians, but a distinction was legitimately drawn in the impressive letter contributed to THE INQUIRER recently by the mover of the amendment, between the College as actually historically established, and the principles on which it was founded, and the kind of College that the founders desired to realise. Now, the first point which I wish to put before you is this. The English Presbyterians were unanimously comprehensionists. They had been excluded from the Church of England by tests which they could not accept, but their whole ideal was an ideal of inclusion alike in religion and in academic work. I hold it impossible, therefore, to suppose that when they declared that their College was to be opened to men of all denominations they intended to require that the members of other Churches who entered that College should forego the Confession or the Creed of their own Church. That that was the case with our own College is perfectly clearly shown by the fact that the second student who entered was permitted to enter for Divinity in the Church of England. At the Warrington Academy, which preceded, it was the rule that the students should attend the Church of England or some other congregation which their parents desired. In the College at Carmarthen, over which the Presbyterian Board has presided, it was for many years the usage of students who intended to take orders in the Church of England under the Bishop of St. Davids to go through the course of that College, and they were expressly admitted for the purpose. When the Lampeter College was founded for the Church of England, the attendance began to decline, and afterwards, through the disapproval of the ecclesiastical authorities of their study at a Nonconformist academy, founded under Nonconformist influences, the attendance ceased. The "witness" is perfectly clear that the Presbyterians desired the most comprehensive and inclusive administration. Now, Sir, we have heard a great deal of history, but I think everyone will admit that the practice of the Committee on any given application before them must be guided by the rules then in force, and by the traditions of their administration. What are the rules under which this College is now administered, and has been administered for more than twenty years? Why, the prime declaration is this:—

> The College exists for the purpose of promoting the study of religion, theology, and philosophy, without insisting upon the adoption of particular doctrines.

I find nothing there about Protestant, Nonconforming, Non-subscribing, or Dissenter. For whom is the College intended?

> The curriculum of the College is designed both for students for the ministry of religion and for others who wish to obtain a special knowledge of theological and philosophical subjects.

Then it goes on to define the regulations for the special students and for the regular students, and the kind of candidates who are to be let in:—

> Every candidate for admission as a regular student must submit with his application a recommendation, signed by three competent and disinterested witnesses, who shall certify that on their personal knowledge his moral character and natural endowments are such as to qualify him for becoming a student of the College; the certificate must be in the handwriting of one of them. A candidate for admission as a student for the ministry must, in addition to the foregoing, present a satisfactory medical certificate, and the recommendation (one of the subscribers to which must be a minister of religion) must certify that he is qualified by disposition and ability to become a student for the ministry, and that the ministry is the object of his own voluntary choice.

I will not recite the steps by which these rules came into being; they go back as far as I can trace them to the year 1817, when for the first time the Trustees required a recommendation signed by three Protestant Dissenting ministers, who were to testify not to the ecclesiastical destination of the candidate, but to his respectability and his ability to read Homer and Horace. The next year they added vulgar fractions. Now when were these rules which I have quoted introduced? They were solemnly adopted at a meeting of the Trustees held in June, 1882. That period coincided with the great gift made by the members of the University Hall to this College. I presume that it meant that when the College became possessed of a public building in London, it took occasion to define its idea of its purpose, and by that idea and by those regulations the College has been governed ever since.

Now, Sir, you will notice that in these regulations there is not even the limitation "Christian." As far as these regulations go you might have a Mohammedan from Mecca, or a Buddhist from Japan or even a Mormon from Utah, subject to their presenting the proper intellectual and moral qualifications. But though the term "Christian" does not occur, the spirit of Christ is there. Why, this is the very invitation of the Gospel: "They shall come from the East and from the West, from the North and from the South, and shall sit down in the Kingdom of God." And, Sir, wherever there is allegiance to truth, to liberty, to religion, there, I believe, the Kingdom of God exists. We may be weak, we may be obscure, we may be almost unknown, for we do not advertise; but we have this principle, and we are not going to let it be curtailed.

But once more, Sir, an argument has arisen out of the case of a student, who when he appeared among his brother students and his Professors, was discovered to be a member of the Church of England, and surprise has been expressed that this was not reported by the Committee to the Trustees. Why did not the Committee report it? I presume, Sir, because they did not know. I was of course not privy to what passed in the Committee, but I can give you very good reasons why they should not have discovered it. It is our privilege, Sir, by the courtesy of the Committee, to sit with the Committee when it meets in Oxford. I have been present when many a candidate for admission appeared before them. What is he asked? He is asked about his education, he is asked what books he has read, he is asked whether he has done Sunday-school or mission work and the like, he is sometimes asked in what communion he has been brought up; he is never asked what are his present beliefs, or into what communion he is going. And that practice, Sir, is more than seventy years old. In the report of 1831 I read these words: "no countenance is given to bigotry and intolerance by example. No inquisition is attempted into the religious tenets of students, whether upon entrance or subsequently"; and four years later (in 1835) I read: "The Trustees have endeavoured to supply the student with the best instruments and materials for acquiring religious knowledge, and have neither anticipated inquiry, by the imposition of a test, nor demanded an account of its results." The Trustees, therefore, were perfectly prepared to find their students change in the course of their career, and to continue them with equal goodwill on their foundation. But how in the face of this usage—how under these rules sent year by year to every Trustee along with their report and hitherto challenged by none—how could the Committee or the Principal do anything else when a young man says "I am changing my mind?"

I am told, Sir, that Unitarian money must not be applied for bursaries to men who are going into the Church of England. I do not know what may be the mark of Unitarian money, while it resides in the pockets of the donor, but I do know, Sir, that when that money passes into the treasury of this College, it goes through the College mint, and on one side of it is inscribed the legend "To Truth, to Liberty, and to Religion," and on the other side is inscribed as a consequence "open to all denominations." Why, Sir, how could you possibly divide the income of this College and label one portion of it as "Unitarian" and the rest as "open to all"? What are the actual proportions? I find according to the last Report the cost of maintaining the College for the last year was £3,340; the cost of bursaries to theological students £575; roughly speaking, six to one. By what logic can you declare that six parts of the expenditure of the College shall be available for all who like to enjoy it, and the seventh refer to Unitarian money which should not be given to men who are going to enter a Trinitarian Church?

But, Sir, this one thing more. Objection has been taken to the conduct of a Lecturer of this College, in taking the Communion of the Church of England, and it is considered that the recitation of the Nicene Creed disqualifies him thereby for the free position of a teacher in this place! I am credibly informed, Sir, that another Lecturer who is a rampant and aggressive Unitarian, has taken service under the Unitarian Association in the intervals of his work in this place, and that he goes about from platform to platform advocating Unitarianism with all the strength that he knows how, and that he receives money for doing so. I cannot conceive, Sir, what difference there can be between the Lecturer who as a pledged servant for the time being of the Unitarian Association declaring his disbelief in the first Article of the Church of England, and a Lecturer who for nothing in an act of worship simply recites a Creed which embodies the first Article of that Church.

Sir, there is much more to be said, but I must ask permission for one final word. You came to Oxford on the basis of these rules, of this principle, of this tradition. By doing so and by erecting this noble building you challenged public attention in a way in which you had never challenged it before. Oxford has received us, Sir, with a sympathy which has again and again surprised us, on the strength of these professions. To whom is that due? It is due, first of all, to the nobility of the principles of the College; it is due much more to the distinction of its head. Everybody knows in Oxford that the learning, the scholarship, the piety, the reverence, the purity of mind, the simplicity of character which adorn that noble Christian have won for this College a respect which no other gifts or graces or wealth or position could possibly have conferred upon it; and I say Sir, that if the resolution is carried this day, the position of this College will be seriously compromised in the eyes of the University. Only a few months ago a prominent theologian——

Mr. Carpenter's speech was cut short by the time limit.

Rev. A. W. Fox.

The Rev. A. W. Fox repudiated the suggestion that they had any desire to limit the freedom of the College. They wished that the College should teach theology freely to all and sundry. But when they came to administer the funds of the College the question was, for whom were they intended, who left them, why were they left, and in what way had they been administered all through the past? That was the point, and that was the real point of difference. They did not think that anyone pledged beforehand to enter a creed-bound church had any right whatever to the bursaries of a free institution. They were as willing as any of the committee to admit those who were prepared to pay for the education they got, and in that he thought they differed from all the theological colleges, and if they were to trace the principle on which the College had been working, how were they to do it except by the practice which had ruled through something like a hundred years? All this research into the records of the College showed that while undoubtedly there had been certain students who intended to go into the Church of England, not one of them received a bursary from the college. That seemed to show at least that their Protestant Dissenting ancestors, who were devotees of the Baxterian comprehension, intended that those students who were to be educated for the ministry were to be for the non-subscribing ministry. There was resolution after resolution, and point after point, and Dr. Martineau himself had said that it was not the business of that College to wave the flag of Free Theology, but to train ministers for the Free Churches. They had no desire to tie the hands of the Committee or to express any censure on the present Committee; but as regards the principle of the College, when it said, to impart freely a free theology, he did not think it meant to be free to those who were devotees of a theology which was not free. In answer to the very eloquent and touching appeal of Dr. Drummond, he would say they also wished to serve their God and to choose, but they did not wish that College to be regarded as a place where it was possible for people who were not free to come, except on their own foundation. He asked the Trustees to believe that they had as much at heart as anybody else the true and unfettered freedom of the College; but they did not think the money of their Presbyterian ancestors, which, as far as they could judge from a careful historical analysis, was left for a very definite purpose, should be used for some other purpose. He asked them, in conclusion, to consider the question with open mind and remember that there was no freedom on earth that had not some limitation, and that if they had a certain type of freedom it degenerated into license; and to remember the words of the highest and holiest teacher that mankind had seen, "The truth shall make you free."

The PRESIDENT said it was close upon three o'clock, and he had one more speaker on his list, he asked whether, after calling on him, and on the mover to reply, he should take the division. To this the meeting agreed.

Mr. Lewis Beard.

Mr. LEWIS BEARD said that the action of the Secretary in taking Mr. Haldane's opinion had, he thought, relieved them all very much. As to Mr. Haldane's position, he continued, no words from me are necessary to give him a certificate. He is too well known, and it might seem that after two ministers have dealt with him so trenchantly, it would be out of place and presumptuous for a lawyer to step in. But there is just one point that Mr. Street made which I should deal with for a moment. He said that you ought not to attend to Mr. Haldane's opinion, because he had lost his case. I am afraid, Sir, that if we are only to take the opinions of lawyers who have not lost their cases we are confined to the briefless brigade. The qualification or the disqualification of having lost your case applies to every member of the Bar from that great lawyer Sir Roundell-Palmer, who lost his case in 1853, to the humblest member of the Bar who has ever held a brief, and I hope that before to-day's proceedings are concluded it will apply to Mr. Street. There is just one other point which was made very strongly by the last speaker which I should like to deal with. It was the point that while the promoters of this resolution have no objection to the College imparting free teaching in theology to all and sundry, no matter from what denomination they come—they do object to the application of the money which is represented by the bursaries for the sustenance of those students. Now, Sir, this I thought had been dealt with by Mr. Carpenter in his address. He showed you what a small proportion of the cost of maintaining this College is represented by those bursaries. If the College imparts the free teaching to all and sundry, it offers to all and sundry the advantages of this building in which we speak, of the services of the Professors and all the incidental advantages which belong to the College. The College as a place of learning and a place of study is not maintained for nothing. The room in which we stand has been built out of the funds of the College; the whole building represents money which has been given for the purposes of the College. The students' fees represent but a very small proportion of the cost of giving them that free teaching which the promoters of this resolution are willing they should have, and to draw a distinction between giving money and giving money's worth is not a logical position, and one which I am sure this meeting of Trustees will not support. There is only one word, Sir, that I should like to say in conclusion on the broader aspects of this question, and you will forgive me if it is something of a personal one. I was taught to know and to reverence Manchester College by one who worked for it, was a student of it, was connected with it, and loved it all his life; I was taught that Manchester College stood for absolute freedom, for the pursuit of the truth, no matter to what destination it might lead; and it was to that College that I was told to give my support. If this resolution is passed, Manchester College will no longer be the College which my teacher admired and loved, and served, but something totally different.

Mr. HARRISON then briefly replied, to the effect that nothing had been said to shake the opinions he had formed, and he asked to be excused from further reply, because he was not physically strong enough.

Mr. EDWARD BRAMLEY lodged a protest against the ruling of the chair that he could not vote as representing the Fellowship Fund of the Upper Chapel, Sheffield, which annually subscribed two guineas to the funds of the College.

The division was then taken, the President appointing Mr. A. H. Worthington and the Rev. W. G. Tarrant as Tellers. The result was declared:—

For the amendment, 113.
Against, 29.

The amendment of the Committee thus became the substantive motion.

Another Amendment.

Sir ROLAND K. WILSON then moved the following further amendment, of which he had given notice:—

To omit all after the word "that," and to substitute the following:—

"While no attack has been made from any quarter on 'the original principle of freely imparting theological knowledge without insisting on the adoption of particular doctrines,' and it is therefore unnecessary to re-affirm it, recent incidents have rendered it necessary to declare—

(1) "That it is inexpedient to employ the general funds of the College in affording direct pecuniary assistance to students who do not intend to enter any Protestant Dissenting Ministry; and

(2) "That when Exhibitions are granted to students for the special purpose of enabling them to prepare themselves for some kind of Protestant Dissenting Ministry, it is anomalous and undesirable to insist on their residing in a hostel of which the head is a communicant member of the Church of England."

I come to this question, he said, from the point of view of one more interested in the free teaching and free learning of Theology than in the training of ministers for any particular group of churches, important as that is, and essential as it is to the primary function of the College. Now, whatever else may be said with regard to the resolution which has just been defeated, for which I should have been unable to vote in its entirety if it had become the substantive resolution, it was certainly not an attack on the principle of "freely imparting knowledge without insisting on the adoption of particular doctrines." Non-subscription may or may not be a moral duty; it is, at all events, not a Theological doctrine. Neither does "Protestant Dissent" imply the adoption of any particular doctrine, but simply non-membership of two great ecclesiastical organisations, both of which, as I shall endeavour to show presently, are by their constitutions irreconcilably opposed to the free imparting of Theological knowledge. For this reason I submit that the Committee's amendment, which is now the substantive resolution before us, is superfluous in so far as it proclaims the adherence of the College to this fundamental principle, and mischievous in that it conveys an impression that the principle is a matter of dispute among us. We have listened to Dr. Drummond's eloquent appeal, but we contend that it is absolutely inapplicable to the case now before us. Those who agree with me in this will support the preamble of my amendment. The body of it raises two distinct issues, the first of which was no doubt intended to be disposed of by the statement in the third clause of the Committee's amendment, namely, that owing to the declaration of its founders "the institution will be open to young men of every religious denomination, from whom no test or profession of faith will be required." Now the quotation is from that Report of the meeting held in 1786 which Sir John Romilly considered to be "the only document or instrument of foundation which exists, from whence the conclusions which are to govern this question are to be drawn." We have heard, Sir, Mr. Haldane's opinion, and Mr. Lewis Beard's confirmation of it, with the greatest respect. At the same time, as has been said by speakers on the amendment, a legal opinion depends very much on the materials laid before the Counsel, and it seems to me clear from internal evidence that whatever the materials were which were laid before Mr. Haldane, he had not his attention called in so prominent a manner to certain features on our side as would undoubtedly have been the case, had the instructions been prepared from the other side. I do not wish to go over that ground more than is absolutely necessary, but I will just direct attention to the fact that the sentence which the Committee embodied in their resolution requires to be understood with its context, and in the context it is plainly indicated, and the fact that the Judge, with the whole report before him, drew from it a different conclusion from that now insisted on by the Committee is at all events a reason for studying that context with some care. The paragraph in which the sentence occurs is set out on the first page of that historical statement, for the compilation of which we are so greatly indebted to Mr. Street. You will notice (as was expressly observed by Sir John Romilly) that the plan indicated has two branches: (1) a systematic course of education for divines, and (2) preparatory instruction for the other learned professions, as well as for civil and commercial life. Therefore, the fact that the institution as a whole was to be open to young men of every religious denomination proves nothing as to the class of persons expected to avail themselves of the systematic course of education for divines. I think this is a matter which must have escaped Mr. Haldane's attention, or not to have been in the case before him—the terms on which the Warrington Academy handed over their £117.

Mr. WORTHINGTON: As a matter of explanation I may state that it was in the case as well as the statement on behalf of the movers of the resolution. I am sorry to interrupt, but I thought it might clear the ground.

Sir ROLAND WILSON: It was there? I nevertheless insist that it is important. The same report mentions another resolution, in which the hope was expressed that the trustees of the late Warrington Academy will approve the attempt to establish a seminary of learning similar in its object and its plan to their own, and that they will grant some assistance out of their remaining fund for the support of students in divinity. We learn from the Committee's own statement that the Warrington trustees had shortly before declared the primary purpose of their Institution to be the education of Protestant Dissenting Ministers. It is true that they added these words, "at the same time extending the advantages it may offer to gentlemen of other descriptions who may wish to avail themselves of those advantages." Though this phrase would most naturally refer to gentlemen preparing for lay vocations, it might, no doubt, be stretched so as to cover Divinity students intended for the Church; but in answer to the petition of the promoters of the new Academy, they make their grant simply "upon trust for promoting the liberal education of Protestant Dissenters." It is admitted that the gift so worded, was reported at a meeting of the Manchester Academy Committee as a gift for the purposes of that Academy, clearly implying that the purposes of the Manchester Academy were those described in the Warrington Grant. This last fact disposes of the argument "that this trust governs only the small sum (£117) actually handed over by the Warrington Trustees." It shows the meaning attached by the founders themselves to the phrase, "the purposes of the College"; and, therefore, I submit, governs all subsequent conveyances to the College in which no other purpose is specified. The time limit having been reached, Sir ROLAND concluded by saying that although it was not always so, in the present state of knowledge, assent to the formularies of the Church of England and not merely subscription to the articles, and the use every week of the liturgy, implied recognition of the authority of Scripture which rendered any talk of the free study of theology absolutely unsuitable. He hoped that some might have read his very brief explanation of the motion in THE INQUIRER, and with that explanation he would leave it in their hands.

Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee.

Mr. T. GROSVENOR LEE seconded the amendment, and said that in the matter of Mr. Holden and the College, he considered that Mr. Holden was right and Dr. Drummond was wrong. As to the position of Mr. Addis, all he would say was that if he had a son going into the Ministry he would not on any account send him to a place where, at his meals and in social conversation, he was in the company of a delightful and most agreeable man, who happened to hold those opinions to which he was himself diametrically opposed, and which he would greatly grieve to see a son of his have. Therefore it was perfectly fair to ask for some approval or disapproval of what had been done. He himself thought it a great dereliction of duty on the part of the College to have allowed such a state of things to arise, and he thought it should be put a stop to as soon as it could be honestly done. The College would live to repent it, if they did not recognise that many people felt very seriously on the subject of Mr. Addis's position at the College.

Mr. John Dendy.

Mr. JOHN DENDY, who was the last speaker, said: I do not intend to travel over again the history which has been so exhaustively dealt with before you to-day. All the arguments which we have heard used on those grounds against the original resolution are to my mind applicable with equal force against the amendment which we are now invited to pass; and if one thing stands clearly out as the result of our discussion this morning and this afternoon, it is this, that the College stands, and the possession of it is based upon a freedom which you cannot affect, or alter, or diminish by anything you may do to-day. What you can do is this: you can, if you pass the amendment that is now before you, write a melancholy page in the history of that College. You can inscribe your names upon it in that history as the names of men who, at the beginning of the twentieth century, were unable to rise to the height to which the men at the end of the eighteenth century rose. You can write yourselves down if you pass this resolution as heirs, but unworthy heirs, of a great heritage—of the principles to which you owe your very existence as a religious community.

Now, Sir, there are reasons why I believe that this is even more objectionable—more strongly to be resisted—than the original resolution; and those reasons are mainly that it focuses and narrows down this question into a vulgar quarrel between Church and Dissent. The subject was introduced to us first to-day, and an appeal made to us on the broad principle of Non-subscription. We were, therefore, dealing with a great principle, and with a dignified and worthy subject for our debate, but now it is nothing but a question of dissent of any kind against the Church of England as regards those who, we are told, are eligible persons as students of this College. Any Protestant, any Dissenter, no matter how closely tied he may be by pledges and undertakings, no matter how narrow his views—and we know, unfortunately, that there are many Dissenters whose views are stricter than those of the Church of England itself—that matters not; so long as he is a Protestant Dissenter protesting against the Church of England, he is welcome to all the provisions, and all that we can give him; but the one class of men pointed out to us, according to this amendment, as being unfit to enjoy the full benefits of the College, or to be head of our Hostel, are Communicant members of the Church of England. Why should we go out of our way to point and accentuate in this manner that miserable quarrel between Dissent and the Church which has done so much to disfigure the history of Church and Dissent in the past?

Sir, one other very special objection there is to this amendment, and that is that it is personal, and directly a blow at Mr. Addis. It is not for me to attempt to defend Mr. Addis in this meeting, nor is it for me to lay down the lines upon which the trustees should conduct themselves with regard to him, with this only exception, that the one guiding rule, it seems to me, that we should observe in difficult and delicate cases such as this, is that we should act as gentlemen dealing with a gentleman, that is to say that we having once got his pledge of loyalty to the College (which we have and have it doubly certified by the Principal), should not go about seeking for causes of suspicion—hunting for acts of his outside which seem to be inconsistent, but which he may be perfectly well able to reconcile with his position, and which we are bound to believe, unless we are prepared to vote him down as a dishonourable man—that he does honestly, and can honestly reconcile with his position in this College. It is time enough for us to move in this way against Mr. Addis when some overt act of disloyalty on the part of Mr. Addis is brought before us, but no such overt act has been brought before us or even hinted at.

Sir, we have had a great deal of consideration to-day drawn from the realm of law and history; I am not sure that we should not have some drawn from the realm of common sense and Christian charity. A little common sense would have prevented us, or some of us, I think, from magnifying some of these matters that have come before us. There is the case of one student in a great many years who may have got a little of your money and afterwards gone into the Church—one professor in how many years? But, lo and behold, a vision is brought before us of a college filled with divines of the Church of England, and perverting the minds of sturdy Protestants. The thing has gone too far, and I feel that on this ground of common sense we should put it away from us once and for all, and wait until there is some danger to deal with. And, Sir, on the ground of Christian charity also: Is it to go forth as the deliberate opinion and desire of this meeting of Trustees that no crumb shall fall from our table from the abundance of good things with which Providence has blessed us, which by chance may be taken up by someone who does not belong strictly to our faith? Surely it would be a lasting and painful and ineradicable disgrace if we were by our vote to-day to show ourselves so lacking in those elementary principles of Christian charity and goodwill towards our fellow men. I do think that is a consideration that has not been sufficiently dwelt upon, and that we should do well to dwell upon it further in coming to a decision upon this vote to-day. Sturdy Nonconformists we have heard of both in literature and, if I mistake not, in some of the speeches to-day. I am a sturdy Nonconformist, tracing back my descent to the Commonwealth in an unbroken line of Nonconformity. But there is one thing I have learnt with my Nonconformity, that there is a nobler thing even than sturdy Nonconformity, and that is sturdy Christianity—sturdy Christianity which rises beyond Nonconformity. I appeal to you: let us to-day show that, although we are sturdy Nonconformists, we are also sturdy Christians, sturdy in that charity which is the essence of Christianity, in that generosity which alone entitles men to say that they are Christians indeed.

The PRESIDENT being about to put the question, Sir ROLAND WILSON asked whether the two portions of the amendment, which raised very different questions, might be put separately, but the President replied in the negative. The amendment of Sir Roland Wilson was lost by a large majority, and the President having declined (citing the authority of Sir Reginald Palgrave) to accept the previous question, moved by Mr. F. Monks, the Committee's amendment, as the substantive motion, was put to the meeting and carried by a large majority.

On the motion of Mr. A. H. WORTHINGTON a vote of thanks to the President was carried by acclamation, with great warmth of feeling, and the meeting, which had lasted from half-past eleven, with half an hour's interval for lunch, until a quarter to four, was brought to a close.

CORRESPONDENCE.

IN ONE SPIRIT.

SIR,—It struck me at Tuesday's meeting that although we all gave each other credit for desiring the good of the College above all things, we omitted to acknowledge that both sides were really striving towards the same goal—freedom for the sake of truth. I cannot help thinking it would help towards future peace, and prevent much misunderstanding, if we could all recognise this, and that it is only when we come to deciding what is the best method to gain and to guard our common purpose that we fall into two opposing camps.

We have learnt that truth is not the exclusive possession of any one fold, but is the joint possession of many. Let us try to learn the further lesson that freedom, too, is best safeguarded, not by a rigid definition of how and where we think it can alone be found, but by the larger charity which recognises the self-same spirit under varying forms, and the deeper faith which has learnt that with regard to Freedom, as well as Truth, the Eternal Spirit does not lead us all by the same paths.

MARGARET J. SHAEN.

THE HUNGARIAN UNITARIAN CHURCH.

SIR,—I would gladly accept Mr. Boros's correction did I understand how it corrects.

(1) I have always thought that "bishop" meant overseer or superintendent. Even here in England he has no power to alter or annul the dogmas of his Church.

(2) A Church or Religion which derives from the State authority "to build churches, schools, baptize, &c., and send the bishop to Parliament" is surely described with sufficient accuracy as State-established.

(3) The confessional character of the Hungarian Unitarian Church is re-asserted when Mr. Boros says, "they have been forced to sign that confession," and later "actually referred to a quite different confession as their own."

Mr. Boros thus seems to confirm rather than correct my statements in every particular. J. M LLOYD THOMAS.

Nottingham.

TWO CORRECTIONS.

SIR,—Mr. Solly's letter to me of December 1, 1903, contains no such prohibition as he prints within quotation marks. What he actually says is, "I don't want what he said to me to be made more than a point of departure for useful inquiry." Nor was it. Mr. Solly knows that I am making this correction.

In my letter last week "eighteen months ago" should read "eight months ago."

C. J. STREET.

Sheffield, November 30, 1904.

AN EXPLANATION.

SIR,—A correspondent writes to say it was not generally known that the L.D.M.A. included Cumberland, where, according to his map, "little" Bootle is situated.

"The other Bootle is an important borough of near 60,000 inhabitants, and the attendance at the Unitarian Church will compare favourably with churches of the same body in the neighbouring, rather envious, rather patronising city of Liverpool."

Now it is true that one might well envy the activities of the Bootle Free Church: but we do not patronise what we genuinely admire. The fact is, I believe, that when writing, my sub-conscious self reported the favourite expression of Bootle's minister, when he speaks of his vigorous church in the assemblies of an adjacent city. And please will my correspondent understand, that my language, as well as his minister's little formula, is but an example of the affectionate language of diminutives.

H. D. ROBERTS.

THE care that is taken in securing healthy and pleasant conditions for the inhabitants of German towns is shown in a lecture delivered by Herr Pauly at the fourth meeting of the Schleswig-Holstein Building Company in Flensburg. He said that no town of any importance makes its plans for laying out new districts without calling in an expert for consultation, who, with the public authorities, decides on the arrangement and location of parade streets (wide streets with trees, flowers, and extensive pavement for promenaders), business streets, and residence streets. Trading requirements, pleasant prospects along the streets and from the houses, and general arrangements for health, are all taken into careful consideration, and builders and landowners are obliged to conform to the town plan. Herr Pauly is Town Architect at Kiel, and his official position and the character of the assembly he was addressing, are a sufficient authentication of the truth of his statements. Would that similar wisdom went to the planning of our English towns.

ROSAMOND DAVENPORT-HILL.*

FEW women workers in England lived a more strenuous or more useful life than Miss Rosamond Davenport-Hill. She was a noble product of what may be called Puritan England. Self-reliant, conscientious, hard-working, balanced in judgment, eager in promoting the common good, enthusiastic in her desire to train and mould the minds and characters of the child-population of this country—Miss Davenport-Hill's career renders a belief in Pessimism impossible.

In a little volume of less than 150 pages Miss Metcalfe has sketched the life of Miss Hill during her girlhood in Hampstead, her residence in Bristol, her entry into public life in London, her School Board work, and her last days at Oxford. The book will be prized by those who knew Miss Hill, and to those who did not know her it will prove instructive and stimulating.

She came of good stock. Her mother was a woman of strong character, intelligent and energetic; her father was the well-known Recorder of Birmingham, Matthew Davenport-Hill. Rosamond, the eldest daughter, was born in Chelsea, August 4th, 1825. At the age of five her parents removed to Hampstead, where they lived for eleven years; there Rosamond attended school, and soon showed that she possessed a keen intelligence and a strong, determined character. Her cousin, Emily Clark, gives a vivid account of these days, when Rosamond "worked like a horse," though her life at school was not very happy. "Even then, in her eager sympathy and the way in which she made the business her own, she showed the qualities which made her such a power for good in her after life, a power most admirably used and directed by straight-forward common sense which so many would-be philanthropists are apt to throw aside." During these early years she became acquainted with Joanna Baillie and other literary people. At the age of fifteen she recorded with great pleasure a visit she paid to Miss Edgeworth.

Thackeray was a visitor at her father's house. Shortly after the publication of Jane Eyre, discussion arose at lunch as to whether the novel was written by a man or a woman. Rosamond thought a woman wrote it, but Thackeray would not agree. "No—with all due deference to the sex, it shows a grasp of reasoning power beyond a woman."

In 1851 her father was appointed to a Commissionership in Bankruptcy, and this required removal to Bristol. There Rosamond was brought into contact with Mary Carpenter, who enlisted her active sympathy in philanthropic work. Writing many years afterwards she said of Mary Carpenter:—

> By the force of her genius, aided by her self-sacrificing devotion, she cut for herself a path up which she toiled, until in attaining her end she had raised herself to a height whence her opinion and advice, on her own peculiar subject, were sought by some of the most enlightened of her countrymen. At the same time she conferred a boon on her own sex, by demonstrating that a woman may be as capable of bearing a part in the direction of the country's affairs as her male fellow-citizens. Lacking both high position and wealth, a member of a sect which, if not condemned, is often held at arm's length, she yet surmounted all the manifold obstacles which beset her path, and lived to wrest from the governing powers those reforms to the promotion of which she had devoted her life.

There grew up a strong and tender affection between father and daughter. She travelled with him, read to him, took part in his correspondence. In 1872 her father died; then followed a prolonged visit to Australasia. In 1879, along with her sister Florence, Miss Davenport-Hill settled once more at Hampstead. In November of that year she was elected a member of the London School Board, and her chief work in life began. The electors of the City of London remained faithful to her candidature through many vicissitudes, until her voluntary retirement in 1897.

From first to last Miss Davenport-Hill was one of the most respected, hard-working, conscientious, and courageous members of the London School Board. In connection with its Industrial School work, Cookery and other domestic subjects in the training of girls, she was a leader and a pioneer. High-minded and inflexible of will, she had a large heart full of genuine sympathy. Sceptical of the value of mere emotionalism in education or philanthropy, impatient of pretence, aroused to indignation by falsehood and deceit, she was always ready to stand fast by truth and right, to support progress and reform, and to make the welfare of the children of the people paramount. She lived an exceedingly busy life. Rising often at six o'clock in the morning, she attended to her correspondence, read through the business papers of the committees on which she served, and was ready to start off on her visits to schools or to be in attendance at the offices on the Embankment with the regularity and punctuality of a City clerk. Wendell Phillips is reported to have said that "the only interest worthy of the deep controlling anxiety of thoughtful men is the shielding and training of the children of a nation." To shield and train the children of London, was the high purpose to which Miss Davenport-Hill devoted her active brain and busy life.

During the years of stress and storm on the London School Board she kept steadily at work, ever faithful, always sure to be at the post of duty, never losing heart or hope. In the theological controversy dominated by Mr. Riley, and into which Mr. Diggle was drawn, probably against his own better judgment, Miss Hill bore a valiant part. The writer of the Memoir is mistaken in representing the introduction of the word Christian, on the suggestion of Mr. Lyulph Stanley (now Lord Stanley of Alderley), as preceding the drafting of the notorious Circular. It was during the progress of the discussion on the Circular that this via media was proposed. Miss Hill and a few others objected to this or any other addition or alteration, but they were defeated. Nor is it correct to say that Mr. Riley drew up a second circular with the object of forcing the teachers "to accept the doctrines set forth in the first." Mr. Riley's policy was mischievous enough, but it did not go this length. He wanted to divide the sheep from the goats, to discover how many were willing to teach the crude tritheism of the Circular, and how many wished relief. He professed himself quite willing to afford relief to such teachers as were not Trinitarian. The whole attempt, though for the moment triumphant, failed; and at the next election the clerical party and policy were destroyed, much to the relief and delight of Miss Davenport-Hill.

Failing eyesight and advancing years compelled Miss Hill to slacken her pace, and gradually to relinquish her work. She struggled on courageously for a time, and then retired from the School Board in 1897. Along with her sister she took up her abode in a delightful house, "Hillstow," a little way out of Oxford. Her interest in all good causes remained. Occasional visits of friends from London were welcomed by her and enjoyed by them; and she was thus kept in touch with the active, bustling metropolis in which she had worked so long and so well. She attained the age of 76 on August 4th, 1902; on the following day she passed away in her sleep.

"She was a noble woman," writes a man who knew her well, "so tender and sympathetic, yet so wise and sound of judgment. She was the stuff of which is made great administrators, great statesmen. Such, let us hope, will be the type of 'goodness,' to which the best men and women of the coming time will strive to approximate."

COTTAGE SMOKE.

THE faint wreaths seem to rise immediately from the tall bracken as we approach the hill-crest. They are of the hue of lavender—bluer against the dark of the woodland, greyer where that is broken to admit the "daffodil sky." There is no breeze, but the air, heavy with evening moisture, brings the delicate scent of the smoke to our nostrils, and heart and brain pulse gratefully. The treasure-house of memory is opened, as by the smoke-genie of Eastern story, and the mind's eye dwells fondly on many a scene from poem and picture where

> A cottage chimney smokes
> From betwixt two aged oaks, and a genial throng of kindly thoughts attends us. Less known, perhaps, is the genie's appeal to the palate. No doubt, as we linger in this vale of rest the children's supper is simmering. A bowl of milk so prepared, with its faint taste of wood-smoke, is a delicacy of the choicest. No modern cuisine indeed can rival in flavour the simple repasts of Corydon and Thyrsis. True, they are little conscious of their boon, and often, like unfallen man, would give all their Eden for one taste of the tree of knowledge. Alas! there is no one to pronounce that tree forbidden, while from the example of their "betters" to the enterprise of the village shopkeeper, everything seems to foster in men discontent with their primitive board.

The unutterable quiet of these ascending spirals compels us to linger, and our imagination, if already familiar with cottage interiors, pictures the capacious chimney, and the iron pot which will roast as well as boil. It is a "down-fire" that is burning, so called from its blazing on the level hearth, and, in an adjoining corner, huge "faggots"—not the things cut up in Darkest England and sold at seven for threepence, but branches of oak and beech and pine six or eight feet long—are upended, ready for the chopping-block and axe when meal-time is to the fore.

> Old wood to burn!—
> Ay, bring the hillside beech
> From where the owlets meet and screech
> And ravens croak;
> The knotted oak,
> A faggot too, perhaps,
> Whose bright flame, dancing, winking,
> Shall light us at our drinking;
> While the oozing sap
> Shall make sweet music to our thinking.

Hard by is the oven, built out against the wall behind the ingle, its door being a little to the left of the fire and about eighteen inches square. The wood, chopped small, is laid inside and lighted, and in an hour or less, the embers still glowing, the oven is ready for bread, cakes, meats—whatever is to be baked. Both for flavour and digestion—a country digestion—the bread out of these ovens is unequalled. A company might be formed (I do not suggest it) for making such bread, only they would have to circulate with each loaf country air and a quiet conscience—things which, up to the present, no syndicate has succeeded in "placing on the market."

Here, then, still surviving, are the methods familiar to the absent-minded Alfred, and I avow that no exquisite who gives the cares of the kitchen a place in his philosophy can do better than live as the man who is earning fourteen or fifteen shillings a week. He will exchange the highly flavoured for the subtly flavoured, invention for appetite, ennui for contentment. I call old Herrick to witness,

> The while the conduits of my kine
> Run cream, for wine.*

Cottage smoke is contentment made visible, as an old gate reposing in the shade of hawthorns and hazels is the symbol of rest. How silently, with what repose the grasses grow about its lichened posts; and how lazily these blue wreaths we are watching meet the upper air. How, rather, taking a hint from the friendly moisture above them, they cling about the levels whence they sprang, blessing the chance, should the evening be wet, that keeps them even nearer the soil. They are not ashamed of their humble ancestry, no parvenus among the wandering clouds.

Town smoke also haunts its rising in bane of grit and gloom, blackens the heath, and menaces the valley with fierce vengeance of fuel torn from the heart of the earth, and angrily seeking to carry mortals with it in its return. Our life is even a vapour. Two such vapours arise in the brief day of our service, the one returning to the dust in fierce resentment at the forces that called it forth and have kept it down, the other in humble clinging love. Town-smoke and cottage-smoke—a mere parable for children it may be, but here where

> The bracken still russets beneath the oak,
> And God is good to silly folk,

we all are children, having had the greatest of good fortune—to be born again.

THOMAS J. HARDY.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

CLIMBING MOUNTAINS.—I.

IN the 34th chapter of the Book of Deuteronomy we are told how Moses, who had been leading the Children of Israel through the wilderness to the Promised Land, felt himself growing old and feeble, and something told him that he would never actually enter Canaan; so he managed to climb to the top of mount Pisgah, from which point of vantage he saw the land of Gilead. The view gladdened his eyes, and he died happy. If he had not climbed he would have passed away with a sad and weary heart.

All of you may have seen a mountain, though you may not have stood on the top of one. There it stands towering up towards heaven, its summit sometimes wrapped round with clouds so that you cannot see it. In the distance its sides look so steep that you think ascent must be impossible; but when you get nearer to it you find that there is a way up. Starting to climb it you find sheep tracks, and also evidences that other people have been up before you. There are so many interesting things to see that you get over the ground without feeling very tired.

The mountain sheep are shy, and skip out of your way as you approach them. Grouse and lapwing soar up and away with a scream, lest you should disturb their nests; and here and there you find springs of water bubbling out of the ground and trickling down their moss-grown courses to join a stream which gathers force as it flows, breaking into foam amongst the boulders or leaping down a gully, breaks into spray upon the rocks beneath. Perhaps you kneel down, and, putting your parched lips to this crystal spring, take a deep draught of it, and think it more refreshing than the costliest wine ever made.

Now and again you stop and look back. The view constantly changes. In the distance you see a lake reflecting in its clear depths the blue of heaven; perhaps you get a glimpse of the distant sea, and the higher you get the less exertion climbing seems to be. Yet it is not all plain sailing.

Here and there you stop, and debate as to which way you should take. There is nothing to definitely guide you. After going a little way to the right perhaps you come to the edge of a precipice which goes down sheer some hundreds of feet, and you shudder at what would happen were you to wander that way in the dark and slip over. So you retrace your steps, and try another way until you find the right one. And often when you think you are climbing the last peak another and a higher one comes into view, which involves further exertion. You find parts of the mountain where the shale underfoot is loose and shifting, and unless you exert the utmost care you will slip and roll down the steep and jagged sides, to be picked up at the bottom a mangled corpse. But you keep your head cool, and eye intent upon your path, and carefully test every step you take until at last you find yourself at the top, and you shout for joy at the magnificence of the view that bursts upon you. Besides, you feel the delight of victory. As you look back you discern just how and where you mistook the road, and what dangers you narrowly escaped. The memory of all the beautiful and wonderful things you saw and heard will afford you pleasurable reflection as long as you live.

I remember a delightful holiday I spent with some friends in a mountainous district. One day when we were climbing one of the party had on boots with india-rubber soles. She had been up that mountain before, and knew that the route was for the most part over grassy slopes, and so where the rest were constantly slipping she glided up with the greatest of ease. The following day another of the party put on rubber-soled boots; but the mountain we then climbed was covered with loose, sharp stones, so that the boots were cut to pieces, and the climber's feet sorely bruised. You see, in climbing mountains it is always best to be prepared for the worst. Envious imitation often leads people astray; and incidents like this frequently occur in ordinary life.

He who is not equipped for emergency may expect to find himself in very queer plight at times. Those who climb about mountains must not follow every track. The shepherds, for instance, who in lambing season have to find their way into almost inaccessible places at night time by the aid of a glimmering lantern, have steady heads, feet as sure as the goats, and nervousness is unknown to them; but even in the open day, apart from the terrors of night, it is folly for all but a very few of us to tread these narrow paths where a false step, a nervous slip, would mean death.

So in this life of ours be careful how you venture up giddy heights. Some folk can, owing to temperament or training, walk very close to the edge of perdition and ruin with no fear of falling over the precipice; but it does not follow that you can do the same. It is, as a rule, wisest to pursue the beaten track until experience has hardened your sinews and made your nerves like iron, and you feel that you are really an accomplished mountaineer.

You little brothers and sisters of mine are climbing mountains every day, and you are not always well pleased with the task, although they are mountains which many men and women have already ascended, and in the steep and dangerous sides of which they have cut a lot of steps so as to make the going easy for you. I shall tell you more about those mountains next week.

CHARLES ROPER.

A NEW volume of the Theological Translation Library, which Messrs. Williams & Norgate will publish before long, will be the first half of the Rev. Dr. Moffatt's Translation of Prof. Adolf Harnack's important work, "The Expansion of Christianity in the First Three Centuries."

As an outcome of the Oxford Summer Session, the Sunday-school Association have arranged with the Rev. Thomas Robinson to give a model nature lesson at the schools of Portland-street, Stamford-street, Mansford-street, and Newington-green. The dates and subjects are advertised. Teachers and older scholars of the schools in the district will form the audience. In this way teachers may learn how a class may be interested and how a real religious lesson may be given.

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY.

MEETING OF S. S. TEACHERS AT STAMFORD STREET.

As an outcome of the Oxford Summer Session, where the evening devoted to notes of actual lessons given by the teacher had been greatly appreciated for their suggestiveness, a similar meeting was held at Stamford-street last Saturday evening on the invitation of the minister and teachers of that chapel. There was a very representative gathering of our London Sunday School teachers. At Oxford the subject had been "Bible Lessons;" on Saturday the subject selected was "Lesson Notes on Nature Study."

Miss MARIAN PRITCHARD presided, and in her opening speech referred to the importance of learning not only what to teach, but also how to teach it, and she quoted a passage from one of Channing's discourses, wherein he lays emphasis on the importance of studying the art of teaching, the "way of approach to the youthful mind"; which he maintains should be one of the principal ends of every teachers' meeting. One means by which this end may be helped forward is by comparison of our own methods with that of others; and it was this means which was to be adopted that evening, for five practical teachers had been good enough—and brave enough, for it required no small amount of courage—to promise to give a ten minutes' condensed lesson, in the hope that their efforts might be of service to their comrades. The subject selected for that evening was "Nature Study," and though in the past it was felt that the Bible alone should be the text-book of the Sunday School, it must not be forgotten that Jesus himself went to Mother Nature for some of his most beautiful lessons. As Whittier has so well said:—

> "His sermons were the healthy talk
> That shorter made the mountain walk;
> His wayside texts were flowers and birds,
> Where mingled, with his gracious words,
> The rustle of the tamarisk tree,
> And ripple wash of Galilee."

Mr. VERSTAGE (East London) gave the first lesson to an imaginary infant class, on "Consider the Lilies," showing pictures of them, and giving a lily's charming little sermon to a discontented child.

Miss HILDA PRITCHARD (Newington Green) spoke to a class of boys from thirteen to sixteen on "Plants and their unwelcome guests," showing (with blackboard illustrations) how these were either kept at bay by the insect friends of the plant, or by other means; and the teacher pointed out how such a lesson would lead up naturally to the subject of citizenship.

Mr. MARSHALL (Avondale-road) took the "Various forces at work in the world," symbolising them as fairies, and showing how behind them all was a Power greater than themselves; thus leading up to the thought of God, as expressed in Psalm 145.

Mr. THOMPSON (Highgate) spoke to his class of lads of thirteen and upwards upon "The ground on which we tread," having prepared and brought with him two coloured diagrams, showing the undulating surface of the North of London, and also a rough geological chart of the same. Such a lesson would help to teach scholars that most important lesson that effects are produced by causes, and that things do not happen "by chance."

Mr. A. S. NOEL (Stratford) took "The structure of flowers," with assistance of microscope and blackboard, using the latter to keep the boys interested in the subject while they were waiting for their turn to come to look through the microscope.

At the close of these lessons Mr. ION PRITCHARD read a letter from a minister, who felt that Nature study was not quite the best subject for Sunday School teaching, as not sufficiently religious; he (Mr. Pritchard) felt, however, that the experience of the lessons given that evening certainly did not appear to support that view.

Dr. GHOSH spoke of a Sunday School in India in which he used to teach, where the time was divided up for lessons in Nature study (in order to develop the imagination of the children, who are naturally materialistic), lessons in literature and biography, and, lastly, lessons in human life. These three were finally drawn together by the minister, who gave the prayer and concluding address, in which he showed that all these were united in the one Eternal Spirit from whom all good things proceed.

Mr. C. A. GINEVER and Mr. W. H. BALLANTYNE having spoken, a vote of thanks to Miss Pritchard, moved by the Rev. W. H. TUCKER, and seconded by Mrs. TARRANT, brought the meeting to a close.

WE publish this week a very full report of the special meeting of the Trustees of Manchester College held at Oxford on Tuesday. During the past month we have devoted a great deal of space to the controversy over College affairs, and feel obliged now to say that further voluminous correspondence on the subject will not for the present be welcomed by THE INQUIRER. There are other obligations which we must now endeavour to fulfil before the end of the year.

THE two big bazaars are in progress as we write, having been opened on Wednesday and continuing daily to the end of the week—the Priestley Centenary Celebration Bazaar of the Midland Christian Union in the Birmingham Town Hall, and the East Cheshire Christian Union Bazaar in St. James's Hall, Manchester. Reports of the proceedings and results we must reserve for next week.

WE referred last week to the historical Handbook, issued in connection with the Priestley Centenary Bazaar at Birmingham. This book, with its dainty cover, and interesting series of pictures, is sold at 2s. net, and copies may be had at Essex Hall. Correspondents are asked to note that orders from a distance should enclose 3d. extra for postage.

THE following declaration on the subject of Protection is being offered for signature to the clergy of the Church of England. The movers in the matter, whose names are appended, invite their brethren to this action on the following grounds:—"The keenness of the debate which has raged round Mr. Chamberlain's Fiscal Proposals tends to obscure the deeper issues involved. Our attention is concentrated upon those salient details on which the controversy has focussed itself—the possibilities of Retaliation—the subtleties of Dumping—the complicated effects of Preferential Tariffs. In the meantime we are apt to forget that behind all this superficial discussion lie certain fundamental judgments, ethical and social, which are profoundly involved in the issue. It will not then be deemed impertinent or intrusive if those who are charged with any special responsibility for the national conscience venture to detach and emphasise these essential considerations, which are vital to the verdict that is to be given."

The Declaration.

We, the undersigned, desire to protest against the re-establishment in Great Britain of a system of Protection, because, however sincere and patriotic may be the intention of its advocates, in itself it inevitably tends to evoke the motives and foster the tendencies against which we are all accustomed to protest as immoral.

(1) It cannot succeed without increasing the severance of nations; it intensifies rivalries and strengthens barriers; it is a foe to peace, and to the hopes of a wider unity of workers.

(2) No nation can adopt it without danger to the uprightness of its public life; it makes bribery pay; it creates monopolies; it opens the door of Parliamentary lobbies to all those influences which it is our main object to exclude.

(3) It is bound by its very conditions to tell hardest upon those who are least able to protect themselves. It will be secured by those who can best apply the pressure necessary to make their case heard. The tariff will be moulded by and for the best organised. The weak and unauthorised will be least able to make their interests felt; and will have to bear the burden of the gain of the strong.

THE Rev. S. and Mrs. Farrington are leaving London at 2.20 this afternoon, en route for Palermo, in Sicily, intending to be absent for five or six months.

THE child has a will as well as yourselves. The great design of his being is that he should act from himself and on himself. He can understand the perfection of his nature, and is created that he may accomplish it from free choice, from a sense of duty, from his own deliberate purpose.—Channing.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Appeal.

Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel.—Mr. C. F. Pearson, Redington Lodge, Hampstead, and the Rev. Wm. Lyddon Tucker, 41, Trent-road, Brixton, make the following appeal:—May we through the medium of your valuable paper appeal to your readers on behalf of the Poor's Purse. There is a great deal of distress owing to the recent severe weather and lack of employment. Any contributions entrusted to us will be carefully expended, and givers may rely on a wise use being made of their money. Bis dat qui cito dat.

Belper.—The Rev. J. E. Manning conducted the services last Sunday morning and evening, as representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. He preached in the morning on "My Creed," and in the evening on "The Mysteries of God and the Mysteries of the Theologians." Both services were well attended by members of the congregation and others from outside. On the Monday evening Mr. Manning lectured on "What Unitarians believe about God." The chair was taken by Dr. Barwise, the Derbyshire sanitary inspector and county analyst, who, in his opening speech, paid a high tribute of respect to the work which Unitarians had done in the city of Birmingham, with which he had been chiefly connected before coming to that county, and the friendships which he had formed amongst them. Though himself brought up and still continuing a Churchman, he, as a subscriber and reader of the Hibbert Journal, could not help respecting the broadening influence which Unitarian literature was exercising on the theological thought of to-day.

Chowbent.—On Sunday evening a special collection was taken in aid of "The Ministers' Pension Fund," on the occasion of an organ recital given, at the close of the ordinary service, by Mr. R. H. Wilson, F.R.C.O., Mus. Bac. (Oxon.), director of the Hallé Choir, and of the Birmingham Festival.

Lancaster.—On Sunday evening last the Rev. J. C. Pollard gave the last of his series of Lectures on "Some Affirmations of Unitarian Christianity." The lectures have been listened to by full congregations, and with the deepest interest. Several new members have attached themselves to the congregation and become subscribers.

Portsmouth.—Since Mr. C. F. Dear, late of Southend, has taken charge of the congregation a more hopeful tone has been given to the church work. Friendly conferences on religious subjects, have been held at the close of the Sunday evening services. A social union has been started on week evenings, and last week a successful sale of work took place, which will enable the congregation to pay off the balance of an old debt incurred some years ago, when extensive internal chapel repairs were found to be necessary. The Mayor and Mayoress of Portsmouth opened the sale, and were much interested—being good Nonconformists themselves—to learn that the history of the High-street congregation went back to close upon the days of the Act of Uniformity in 1662.

South Cheshire and District Association.—The autumnal meeting was held at Matthew Henry's Chapel, Chester, on Wednesday, Nov. 23. Among those present were Miss Montgomery, B.A. (President), Mrs. Myers, Revs. J. C. Street, C. D. Badland, H. F. Short, and H. E. Haycock. In the afternoon a conference was held in the Lecture Hall, at which Mr. W. Vickery read a paper on "Suggestions for the Development of our Congregational Life." Great pleasure was expressed at having once again the presence of representatives from Crewe, who were assured of the unbroken interest of the South Cheshire Association in their doings, and of its good wishes for the success of their new minister in that great centre of railway activity. Anticipating the discourse of the evening, a vote of thanks was passed to the Rev. H. Fisher Short for his ready kindness in consenting to conduct Divine Service, which was held after tea. A collection was taken for the funds of the association.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Rev. Charles Hargrove, after his visit to Australasia as representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, is expected home again on December 16, and, all being well, will preach again in Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, on Sunday, the 18th inst. Mr. and Mrs. Hargrove are returning by way of America, and in the December Mill Hill Chapel Record is published the first part of a most interesting journal-letter telling of their adventures in the island of Tutuila, Samoa. Landing for a few hours on Tuesday, October 18, they managed to miss their boat, and had to wait three weeks for the next to take them on to San Francisco. Without any of their luggage, but happily among hospitable, kindly friends, the enforced holiday and rest, completely cut off from the world, doubtless came to them as a blessing in disguise; but it cut short their opportunities of seeing what they had hoped of America. We are very sorry that pressure on our space at this season prevents our publishing the journal-letter here also.

WE would remind those of our friends who are purchasing Christmas gift-books and prizes for school or home that they should send for the classified catalogue of books for the young folk suitable for such purpose, issued by the Sunday School Association, Essex Hall.

THE Essex Hall Pocket Book for 1905 (1s. net, or in tuck case 1s. 3d. net) is not so sumptuous as this year's, but we were warned that that could not happen again. The special part of the book, the "Directory of Ministers and Congregations," is also issued separately as a little 3d. pamphlet, and it appears to us that the Association might well confine itself to this part of the publication, which can then be carried in any pocket-book that users of it prefer.

DR. SPENCE WATSON said recently that in over a hundred cases in which he had been called upon to arbitrate in disputes between employers and employed he had not known of one case in which the award was not made the basis of settlement. This was, of course, without any compulsion of the parties to abide by the judgment given. Dr. Spence Watson mentioned this experience to strengthen the hope that the arbitration treaties that have recently been made between various nations would result in the peaceful settlement of difficulties and avoid warfare, although there was no power but that of public opinion and the good sense of the parties concerned to enforce the acceptance of the award given. But the fact stated is also a very satisfactory evidence of the good faith and good sense of masters and men, and of the fairness of the arbitrator, too.

THE Triennial Council of American Congregationalist Churches has been discussing propositions for a closer intercourse which may prepare the way for an ultimate amalgamation with other religious organisations in the States. The initial measure which has been decided upon is the formation of a general council representing, besides the Congregationalists, the United Brethren, the Methodist Protestants, and the Baptists. It is difficult to say just how much this joint action counts for in the movement for Christian Re-union. There has for very long been a kind of working agreement between Baptists and Congregationalists in this country. There are the so-called Union Churches; and in many towns where there has not been room for the two denominations, persons professing faith in adult or infant baptism, as the case may be, are admitted as members of whatever church may be found in the locality. Some resemblance to the proposed American Council of the four bodies is found in this country in the Free Church Council. Whether that makes for unity is not quite clear. It has certainly resulted in a more vigorous inter-denominational activity, but probably a common hostility to the Church has had much to do with this. But, although the exact significance of this latest amalgamation scheme may not be quite clear, the issue will be watched with interest.

THE Triennial Council also considered many important questions of internal polity, such as the federation of its numerous societies, the need for strictness in granting licenses to ministers; adult classes in connection with Sunday-school; evangelism and courses of study for those preparing for ordination. A wider interest attaches to a resolution not to place the word "coloured" after the name of Negro Churches in the year-book. This seems on the surface a rather slight thing, but is one of those simple things which sometimes have far-reaching consequences. So far as it goes it is a denial of the current belief in racial subordination. Another resolution is of a curious character, and is in favour of relaxing the administration of the immigration law so as to allow a freer ingress of the educated class of Chinese.

THE difficulty of accepting the doctrine of the Virgin Birth is troubling not only the councils of the Church but of orthodox Dissent, and, indeed, it is not easy to see how this can be avoided so long as the disposition to cling to the belief in spite of the evidence continues. A fortnight ago the Examiner contained a sermon by the Rev. Dr. Barrett on this subject. Dr. Barrett is one of the most prominent among the Congregationalist ministers, and well known for his cautious and conservative temperament, and his conclusion was naturally in the orthodox sense. But it was equally to be expected that the pronouncement would not pass without challenge, and this proves to be the case. Our contemporary prints in the following issue a selection from correspondence on the subject. And these letters are interesting as recognising the traces left in the gospels of the earlier belief on this subject. They probably indicate that as this article of creed has already lost practical interest, so it is in process of losing even the nominal assent it has hitherto received.

AN undenominational hostel nas been erected in connection with the Ripon and Wakefield Diocesan Training College at Ripon with accommodation for twenty-two students. The management is vested in a joint committee of Churchmen and Nonconformists. The Bishop of Ripon, who presided at the opening ceremony last Saturday, expressed satisfaction that this experiment had brought into their midst members of other denominations; and Dr. Banks, of Headingley Wesleyan College, said that the mere fact of the students of different communions being trained together must result in the growth and increase of mutual confidence and respect, and tend to a common respect throughout the Christian Community.

IN the London Welshman, a spirited new-comer in journalism, some remarks were recently made adverse to Welsh Unitarians and their attitude to the "revival" set on foot in Wales by Mr. Roberts, the visionary young student. In last week's issue Mr. Philip Thomas, of Battersea, who writes as "an Ethical Unitarian," takes up the defence. He deplores the introduction of sectarian strife by the set made against Unitarians in connection with one of the revival services, and reminds his orthodox countrymen of the services rendered to Nonconformity at large through Dr. Williams's Library and Carmarthen College. In the course of a long and able letter Mr. Thomas makes some remarks which strike us as very much to the point, and well worth reproducing.

MR. THOMAS says:—

Those who are prone to an emotional or dogmatic idea of religion should not be intolerant of those who think more of reason and less of sentiment, more of conduct and less of dogma. People like myself see features in the revivalist propaganda which are not altogether lovely. We do not taboo the emotional; but we ask that it may be kept within reasonable limits. Only too glad should we be to see men and women plucked from the debauchery of the public-house, and the too frequent profligacy of the public streets into the atmosphere of religious meetings. But we still hold that even in revivalist meetings reason and moderation should play a part. It is not enough to say that such meetings must go as they will, and are uncontrollable by men. Evan Roberts himself claims to act in the same way, but, when workmen in the neighbourhood of Gorseinon struck work to hold a prayer meeting he promptly rebuked them for such irregularity, although they claimed also to be moved by the same Spirit. Sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. Let us have moderation all round. Why should Mr. Roberts himself carry on his work until he falls "like a log" in the big seat; or a young girl at a meeting, prolonged until three o'clock in the morning, shout in a hysterical state until she drops down exhausted? If this is the mark of true religion, why is it that the regular ministers produce no such effects, and that the manifestations only occur at intervals of perhaps forty years? Multiply your meetings, but finish them at reasonable hours, without hysteria and exhaustion. There may be such a thing as spiritual debauch, arising from excess and over-indulgence. Religion should, above all things, be serene. The Welsh saints that live in history have been the "seraphic men."

WOMEN take a large place in the B.A. list of graduates of the University of London this year. Among them we are very glad to see Miss Alice Mary Mellor (Huddersfield Technical College), daughter of the Rev. W. Mellor, who has taken Classical Honours in the third class, and Miss Dorothy Tarrant (Clapham High School), daughter of the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, who is in the first pass division, and doubtless has honours still to take. She won the "Jane Agnes Chessar" Classical Scholarship this spring, and is now at Girton College, Cambridge. Miss Mellor matriculated from Channing House School in 1900.

MESSRS. WILLIAMS & NORGATE announce as nearly ready for publication a translation of two shorter works by the late Auguste Sabatier, "The Doctrine of the Atonement and its Historical Solution," and "Religion and Modern Culture," which together will form a volume in their Crown Theological Library, comprising 250 pages, to be published at 4s. 6d.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

IN this month's Nineteenth Century and After Mr. Sidney Low writes on "President Roosevelt's Opportunities." "There is a growing conviction," he says, "that war is simply a survival of obsolete barbarism, a nuisance and a danger to civilisation at large, and that it may become part of the 'white man's burden' to sit down on the thing altogether, or at least to see that it is kept within bounds." If America develops a great navy, it could join with Great Britain as international guardian of the peace; in the first instance, if war broke out to secure at least that it should be localised, and neutral commerce be protected. Then more might follow.

Such a League of Peace would almost certainly be joined by Japan, probably by Italy, possibly by France. In the end it might include Russia and Germany as well, and so bring about that "Areopagus" of the nations, which may eventually substitute the Rule of Law for the Rule of Might in international politics.

The Countess of Jersey, in an article on "Hymns Ancient and Modern," makes the curious mistake of saying that "Nearer, my God, to Thee," was "certainly" written by a Baptist. Mr. Mallock replies with characteristic force to his critics on the subject of "Free Thought in the Church of England."

In the Contemporary there is an article by Sir Oliver Lodge, illuminating and awakening, on "Religion, Science and Miracle." It contains the substance of an address given partly to students of the University of Birmingham, partly in Liverpool, in the Church Congress week. "Miracles," he says, "lie all around us, only they are not miraculous. Special providences envelop us, only they are not special. Prayer is a means of communication as natural and as simple as is speech." The same number contains an article by Professor Harnack on "The Relation between Ecclesiastical and General History," which is the address delivered at St. Louis in connection with the recent Congress, translated by Mr. T. Bailey Saunders; also an article by the Rev. J. H. Skrine on "Personality and Body," to which it will be interesting to have Canon Hensley Henson's reply.

The Independent Review has an interesting article by Baron Suyematsu on "The Religions of Japan," explaining the relative positions of Confucianism, Shintoism, and Buddhism, of which he points out that the first is not to be regarded as a religion, but rather as a source of moral precepts shared by all alike, and that Shintoism and Buddhism are held conjointly by practically the whole people of Japan (converts to Christianity being left out of account). Mr. G. M. Trevelyan writes an earnest article on "Religious Conformity," noting at the outset that the arguments of Mr. John Morley in "Compromise" have never been refuted, and showing how much moral weakness is caused by insincere conformity. The question as to conformity, he says, is not whether it is more comfortable, but whether it is right. If people will not take truth seriously, it will affect other spheres besides that of religion. "For one thing, genius seldom spreads its wings off the shoulders of a hypocrite."

The men who produce an effect on the world are not those who know the truth, but those who have the courage of their opinions. Truth is great; but it is earnestness that prevails.

On the note of sincerity he concludes, and of moral self-devotion. His aspiration is thus declared:—

I will freely live the life of the spirit and the intellect, which has no bounds but truth and righteousness. "I can no other." And if there is no God to help me, there is in me a divine spark, there are others who can help me; and, in helping others, I too will find salvation.

But when the earnest agnostic has so recognised the divine spark in himself, and determines to be true to it, surely he has already given himself to God.

SELF-DENIAL.

IN whatsoever grade of life he is
That runs the risks of poverty or pelf,
Great independence and great virtue his
Who can deny himself.

How little shall suffice his actual wants!
How small the service he shall ask or need!
The slights of pride he shall not feel; its taunts
Hearing, he shall not heed:

To what do all our grievances amount
But mostly to some selfish want refused,
Or petty dignity of no account,
Or appetite abused.

And if this self by self can be denied,
These are but waves that seek to storm the rock:
It slips them back into the passing tide,
And never feels the shock.

RELIGION IN DAILY LIFE.

"Doth Job serve God for nought?"
SATAN, in the Book of Job.
"To speak no slander, no, nor listen to it."
OATH of ARTHUR'S KNIGHTS.

LOYALTY, self-respect, valour, usefulness, truth, chastity—these were the broad and elemental virtues the need of which Arthur impressed upon his knights by their vow. In such a group it is suggestive to find one vice specifically banned by name, and that one so seemingly venial as slander. It is like an unexpected bit of detail in some great outline, all the rest of which it is left to our imagination to fill in. But the King (or his poet-biographer for him) knew well that just as loyalty and the rest are elemental virtues, so slander is among the basal vices of human nature, and that, like other vices of the sort, it cuts at and tends to destroy the very foundations of human society. The existence of the Arthurian Brotherhood depended upon every man's practising the virtues named in his vow. It depended no less upon their avoiding the crime of defamation. Once let them begin to "damn" one another "with faint praise," or unworthy insinuation, and it could be a question only of time till every man's hand would be against his fellow's, and "all the fair order of the Table Round" would be scattered and dissolved in mutual hate. And yet how lightly we often think of the vice. There are people who would almost as soon expect to find the knights vowing against being late for breakfast, or any other so-called surface fault, as against slander. It is one of the sins most readily committed, and one for which people most easily forgive themselves.

Yet think of its origin. Envy and jealousy, with baffled rage, hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness, are, some or all of them, always present in the seed from which calumny grows. The first quotation at the head of this little talk gives one of the earliest instances in human literature of the uttering of a slander, and it is put into the mouth of that personification of evil called Satan in the Bible. He is represented as full of malicious rage because he cannot subvert the perfect and the upright Job, and "It pays him to be good," he snarls; "if it didn't he would no longer be so, and I wish you would let me prove it"—a mean and miserable calumny which has been a thousand thousand times repeated since then, and as often disproved.

Think of the unutterable meanness of the crime, tried simply, first of all, by any standard of English fair play. In no other case is the victim so entirely at the mercy of his enemy as in slander. A man may be able to beat off the thief who seizes his watch; quickness of hearing and fleetness of foot may save him from the garotter; he may struggle for his life with a murderer; but he is absolutely helpless against his slanderer. For it is in the nature of his vileness that the defamer works out of sight and sound of the person whom he injures. And it is so easy to be a slanderer. It by no means needs the vulgar innuendo, "She's no better than she should be," to blast a reputation. The raising of an eyebrow, a doubtful smile when hearing a friend praised, is quite enough sometimes to conjure up suspicions, and questionings, and hearsays by thoughtless tongues; and the end may be the shattering of fair fame and the ruin of a life's happiness.

"To speak no slander, no, nor listen to it." The words in italics are no unnecessary refinement in the vow; for, unhappily, our very silence upon hearing a malicious imputation, however vague and deprecatory, may be taken for proof of its truth, and do incalculable harm. "I spoke of it before Mrs. So-and-So, and she didn't contradict me, so I know it must be true," is one of the commonest and most illogical excuses of the gossip-monger. We must at least refuse to hear even the most dexterous and gentle insinuation against character if we cannot roundly deny it, or we become accessory to slander.

Think again how slander breaks the Golden Rule, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you do ye even so to them." Which of us "would" that doubt should be expressed, for instance, of our business solvency or integrity, our fidelity to husband or wife, our power to make home happy, our sobriety, veracity, or the value of our Christian profession? We respond instantly to the test, of course. Our self-love and the instinct of self-preservation are up in arms in a moment at the bare mention of such a thought. It follows, then, as night follows day, that we must avoid with whole-hearted scrupulosity anything which borders on the expression of such doubts, or any doubts, of other people. Society is built up on the mutual faith of man in man, the belief of one human soul in the bona fides of another human soul. And to scatter doubts of any individual broadcast, or even to sow them gingerly and with regret, is an act of treachery to human society, and of disloyalty towards that Master whose example and whose principles of living form the goal of the best efforts of our race.

And, lastly, think how evil speaking and the petty, vicious thought which precedes it, must seem in the eyes of the All-Father. Think of "the hospitable greatness" of the God who "sends His rain on the just and on the unjust," and we shall cover our faces with shame at the grovelling and yet egotistical meanness which leads us so flippantly to judge and condemn others.

Rightly looked at, there is no more restful thought in all the range of consciousness than that of the omniscience of God. That "He is Power, and Power is Love" is a Divine and glorious truth, bearing the promise of all good to us, and all success to our efforts towards goodness. But if God loves us under a misconception, with imperfect knowledge, with some black feature of our inmost soul one day to be revealed before assembled worlds? We thank Him it is not so. He loves us as the All-Knowing. Our slanderous judgment condemns because of our half-knowledge. We know nothing of the hidden strivings of our friend against his obvious faults; we do not feel the terrors of responsibility with which a man sees his business trembling under adverse conditions; we do not guess at the bitter tears with which a woman may be striving against sins of heredity or difficulties of position. But in our purblind littleness we are ready to condemn these, and such as these, unheard; or, worse still, to bring upon them the condemnation of others and the ruin of their best chances. On the other hand, it is precisely because God is the All-Knowing that He is so impartial. He knows all our antecedents, the worst facts concerning our mental and physical heritage, all the excuses that may be made for us, the difficulties that we have or have not overcome, the opportunities for self-improvement that we have let slip, our priceless value and our spiritual waste, and yet—He loves us still. He loves us because of His infinite knowledge, which is a part of the infinity of God.

And what is infinite must be a home,
A shelter for the meanest life,
Where it is free to reach its greatest growth
Far from the touch of strife.

But, someone will ask, what are we to do then? Must we see good work being bungled, and evil influences spreading, and say nothing? There is a two-fold answer to that question, I think. The first is given us by the Master when he says, "And if thy brother sin against thee" (or against social order, or the right as you conceive it), "go, show him his fault between thee and him alone." Common-sense leads you to ask yourself, "Is it my responsibility to do that? Have I moral courage enough to do it if it is? And is my soul so filled with the love and patience and hope of God that I am fit to go?" Then, in God's name, "Go: if he hear thee thou hast gained thy brother." If your connection with the matters or persons which grieve you does not warrant your interference, or if you are unable to bring the most disinterested love to bear upon your action, then keep silence, and trust that the All-Knowing God will bring the matter right by other means.

HO! EVERY ONE THAT THIRSTETH

WITH half a world beneath our feet
To stand upon a mountain spire
And watch Time's hand, upon the sheet
Of grey-blue sky, in disk of fire

Mark day's full-stop, with blazonry
Of gorgeous pageant;—this is rare
In mortal lot; yet you and I
Of evening pictures have our share!

Unnoted in the rent and rates,
A year's full panorama wound
About the axis of our gates
Its lovely lure of sight and sound.

The white-cowled oast-house, on the lawn
To eastward, caught the first-born rays
Of suns, whose northmost reach to dawn
Failed in yon copse our westward gaze.

So stood we in some eve of June,
Silenced by Night's solemnities,
When jangling thro' the soundless tune
Came din of rustic revelries.

A flood of glory filled our dell—
Denied this 'our' love will not be!—
You would have grasped the dinner-bell
To bid all feast with you and me.

But no! their choice is other fare;
Rich are we with unenvied gains;
Summoned, those revellers could but stare
And give derision for your pains!

LITERATURE.

BEGINNINGS OF HEBREW HISTORY*

THIS book differs in two respects from an analysis of the Hexateuch such as that which has been edited in so masterly a fashion by Mr. Carpenter and Mr. Harford-Battersby. On the one hand, Dr. Kent ingores the legislation almost completely, and confines himself to distinguishing the various documents in which the myths, the legends, and the early history of Israel are contained. On the other hand, he passes beyond the Hexateuch, and gives the text of Judges and Ruth. The translation is his own, and he has added a large number of notes, chiefly critical, besides an introduction of nearly fifty pages explaining the way in which the books with which Dr. Kent deals were gradually compiled from documents of various dates. The student will find the maps very useful, and we would call special attention to the map of Palestine as we now know it from the Egyptian and Tel-el-Amarna inscriptions before the earliest attempts of the Israelites to settle there. It is also very convenient to have in extenso the Babylonian parallels to the Hebrew stories of the Creation and the Flood, and a valuable table with the approximate dates of Hebrew literature is prefixed.

Dr. Kent is a conservative critic as regards the text of the Hebrew Bible, and this is undoubtedly an advantage in a work of this kind. Reckless emendation of the text has become a serious mischief, and it is especially out of place in a book which appeals, though not exclusively, to beginners. Here and there we are inclined to think that Dr. Kent has been over tolerant of traditional interpretation. We doubt, for example, despite the hesitating support which so high an authority as Dr. Driver gives to Dr. Kent's view, whether the famous words in Gen. ii. 15 can possibly mean, "he shall bruise thee on the head, and thou shalt bruise him on the heel." How can a serpent bruise a man on the heel? And, philologically, the Septuagint rendering "lie in wait" is fully justified. Be that as it may, we are confident that Dr. Kent has misunderstood xxiii. 9. Following a time-honoured interpretation he renders, "Who can count the dust of Jacob, or number the myriads of Israel? Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my end be like his." Now it is very hard to see what "the death of the righteous" has to do with the teeming population of Israel. A very simple correction, abundantly justified by the text as it stands, and the common usage of the Hebrew tongue, gives the sense required: "Let me die the death of the upright, and let my posterity be like his." Balaam saw the mighty battalions of the upright, i.e., the Israelites, moving on to victory. Oh that he and his race could live on in a future like theirs! It is a thought of corporate immortality which dominated the Hebrew long before the belief in, or even the desire for, personal immortality had arisen.

Here we may express our regret that Dr. Kent has reserved for a future volume the three short oracles with which Balaam concludes. Possibly they are, as Dr. Kent thinks, post-exilic, though this is by no means certain. But in any case they are best studied in connection with the rest of the prophecies to which they are appended, and the Priestly narrative which forms a considerable part of Dr. Kent's present volume is itself admittedly post-exilic. There is apparently some confusion in the treatment of Tamar's story, Gen. xxxviii. In a note on the text she is said to have been a woman devoted or consecrated, i.e., devoted to prostitution in honour of a deity. Further, we are told to compare "the many references in the Hammurabi code to the devotees or those consecrated to a god. "Consecrated" is the very word which Dr. Kent uses of Tamar. But the consecrated women of whom Hammurabi speaks are on Dr. Kent's own showing (p. 378) persons who had vowed themselves to a life of celibacy. We may end our list of faults by pointing out a complete absence of index, which is a pity, unless the subsequent volumes are to be issued very soon.

These, however, are not serious defects, and we can most cordially thank Dr. Kent for an excellent and most serviceable piece of work. We are very glad that, following the example set by Gunkel in his most original and delightful commentary on Genesis, Dr. Kent has insisted that the legends of Genesis were born in the tent and by the camp fire, and must have lived in the mouths of men for many an age before anyone dreamed of writing them down. Dr. Kent also shows that the legends are not merely poetical fancies, but contain sound, historical truth, when we penetrate their original meaning and see that they relate of individual heroes things which were really true of tribes and nations. The more we study the early books of the Old Testament and enter into their spirit and language, the more readily will the view suggest itself. Who can doubt that the nations of Israel and Edom are the subjects of the ancient oracle in Gen. xxv. 23, or that it was the tribes of Levi and Simeon, not the men Simeon and Levi who made the murderous attack on Shechem related in Gen. xxxiv? When once the clue has been found the marriages of the Patriarchs and a multitude of similar details become instinct with historic life and interest. Nor must we forget the undying charm of the Hebrew stories as literature, a point to which Dr. Kent has also called attention. They are the most beautiful stories ever told; even the Odyssey is not more interesting than the story of Jacob's adventures, while for pathetic beauty it has nothing to compare with the tender love of Joseph for Benjamin and his aged father. The wonderful description of Iphigenia's sacrifice by her father in the Agamemnon is more than matched by the simpler and deeper beauty of the story which tells how Abraham proposed to sacrifice his son Isaac. The charm of the Bible ought to be not less but far greater now that we are able to disentangle the various threads of narrative, and so to avoid the shock of gross and palpable contradictions. Some inconsistencies, no doubt, remain even in the single narrative. But they are not observed, while we are enthralled by the charm of the narrative; they are no more than the difficulties which occur the moment we begin to analyse so consummate a work of art as the Œdipus Rex in a critical and unsympathetic spirit.

Lastly, we are in full agreement with Dr. Kent on the most important point of all. He has put it admirably in the following words, all the more impressive because they are so temperate and free from the least exaggeration. The narratives of the Old Testament, he says,

"have a perennially helpful message for men to-day, because, unlike the heroes of other primitive peoples, those of the Old Testament are not men of brute strength—Samson stands almost alone [nor again men of mere shrewdness, worldly wisdom or patriotism, like Ulysses], but, like Abraham, they are dominated by a consuming desire to live in communion with the Eternal. Their struggles are not with panoplied warriors, but, as in the case of Jacob, with the baser instincts within them. Their mastering instincts are not to achieve possessions or glory for themselves, but to secure divine favour and blessings for their race. If, like Joseph and Moses, their circumstances made them men of affairs, they won success by their faithful, unselfish devotion to every duty and opportunity which presented itself, and success obtained was simply made in turn the instrument of helpfulness to others".

THE BEGINNINGS OF CHRISTIANITY.*

THE second volume of this work deserves a hearty welcome. If it is, perhaps, less striking than its predecessor, that is due rather to the theme than the author. He has no longer to deal with great personalities like Jesus and Paul. The age of creation has passed. Christianity has been carried forth into the world by the great Apostle to the Gentiles. It has been made, in accordance with the inner principles of the Gospel, a religion for all. But in the process it has been shaped anew. Paul has given to it new theological forms; he has also created its first organisation; and its subsequent history is concerned with the modifications effected by the natural processes of events and the forces which surrounded its thought and life.

The whole book constitutes, in fact, an introduction to the study of the Christian Church in the first two centuries. Much, indeed, is taken for granted. For the story of its gradual spread, its relations with Rome, the successions of its writers, the reader must seek elsewhere. An outline, at least, of this knowledge is assumed. In a second edition, perhaps, the author may consider the expediency of such concessions to the weak as tables of dates or lists of authors. But to the reader who is equipped with the necessary framework of information there can be no better guide among the conflicting tendencies of the period under survey. His view is clear, his touch firm, his utterance fearless. And he is not dismayed either at the complexity of the problems or at the sorrowful indications of decline. He is aware that a period such as that of Jesus and the first disciples cannot be indefinitely prolonged. The fervours of the first days must decrease, and "average Christianity" must take their place. Peculiar conditions, in this respect, affected the early Church. The language of Paul proves that the expectation of the return of Christ was vivid and powerful all through the generation that followed his death. Later documents in the New Testament still show its presence, though with varying degrees of assurance. When it grew fainter and fainter, and the Christians, in Tertullian's language, began to pray for the delay of the final consummation, it was inevitable that the Church should make terms with the world. The letters to some of the churches in the Apocalypse reveal at how early a date this decline set in.

But this process was not solely one of decay. In adapting itself to the permanent conditions of the social order round it, the Church was compelled to face the question of its organisation. The travelling ministries of Apostles and prophets gradually cease, and new officers take their place. Out of the little groups of elders rises the bishop. The brief chapters devoted to this change, at the opening of the volume, will be the least satisfactory to the English reader. The sketch is too slight for those whose appetite has been stimulated by recent controversies. The characteristic excellences of Professor Wernle do not display themselves so fully on the field of ecclesiastical archæology as in the delineation of religious and moral tendencies. In the sphere of theology he is much more at home, and his resolute judgments and unflinching speech will compel many a thoughtful reader to look at familiar things in a new light.

Professor Wernle's method is broad rather than detailed. He speaks of the chaos of religions in the countries round the Mediterranean, but he makes no attempt to describe it. He is content to group the forces round the Church under three heads—Judaism, Hellenism, and Gnosticism. Against Judaism Christianity sought to defend itself by elaborately constructing proofs of the Messiahship of Jesus on the basis of ancient prophecy. These Professor Wernle cannot endure; in the alliterative language of his translator, "all that they advance is figment, feint, and fabrication" (p. 43). Nor has he any sympathy with the attempt of the writer to the Hebrews to compensate Christians for their loss of the institutions of the law by casting the figure of Jesus into a priestly mould. "The whole comparison is a theological tour de force. Thank Heaven, the real Jesus was the outspoken opponent of the high priest. To take from the high-priesthood the colours for his portraiture was pure perversity" (p. 46.). But he recognises sympathetically the influence of Judaism on the ethical side, in the presentation of Christianity as a "new law"; on the worship of the Church, in its form and spirit; on the institutions of the Church, such as penance; and on the character of Christianity as a historical religion, which could not be subtilised into philosophical abstractions. The polemic with Judaism kept Christianity firmly rooted in the Gospel tradition.

Many are the penetrating criticisms suggested by the operation of Hellenism. On the popular side Christ was opposed to the old gods as one newer and stronger; "that is the meaning of the 'Divinity of Christ.' The idea arose among the heathen, and must be conceived of in antithesis to the heathen gods."

Within the New Testament it is the estimates of different elements in the Fourth Gospel which may provoke readers to most dissent. Valuable is the writer's sketch of the dependence of this work on the theology of Paul; excellent is his remark that while it appears to belong to no particular age and to stand above and outside of history, there is scarcely any other writing of the early Christian era which is more a child of its own time (p. 254). Apparently he adopts the reading "only-begotten God" in John i. 18, for he writes of the author, "His undisguised admiration for Jesus as God whose mighty wonders everywhere reveal the mystery—God born of God—shows us how entirely he himself can look at things from the standpoint of Greek thought." The polemic against the Jews in the Fourth Gospel, however, awakes far more serious criticism. Contrasted with the Synoptists, Professor Wernle finds that in its pages "hatred and implacability stand out against love"; the Jews are declared children of the devil solely because they will not believe in Jesus; the alienation between them is so complete that Jesus refuses to pray for them, and limits his petition to his own disciples. And accordingly it is boldly said of the writer, "As a true child of his age, he so distorted the human form of Jesus as to make a fanatic of him, and hence ever since made it as easy for human hatred to be kindled at it as Divine love." "John," he affirms elsewhere (p. 89), "is perhaps the narrowest and most uncompromising theologian of the New Testament." With the theological Jesus of the Fourth Gospel Professor Wernle contrasts the "layman from Galilee, who wished to free his disciples from the theologians, and to make them children, children of God, but who was also inspired by a love for his people so deep as to be altogether beyond the comprehension of these later enemies of the Jews."

Two important chapters have been added to the English edition, on "The Theology of the New Testament," dealing specially with the transformation of the person of Jesus in the Fourth Gospel, and the transformation of the work of Paul in the Acts and Pastoral Epistles. The general result is to showt hat the later teaching is a Catholicised Paulinism. Paul, indeed, stands out in Professor Wernle's investigations as the greatest creative spirit of the early Church. The Fourth Gospel, once accepted as an actual historic delineation, may have exercised a more direct and controlling influence on subsequent theology. It employs a philosophical form—the Logos—to which Paul nowhere alludes. Nevertheless, like the impassioned pleadings of Paul, it revolves round the idea of Jesus as the Redeemer, and its strength and greatness lie entirely, says our author, in the realisation of the Pauline faith in the picture of the Gospel.

The enthusiasm and gratitude of a disciple who found in Jesus life and full satisfaction, are for ever breaking through from the midst of h teful controversy and gloomy judgments of condemnation. Even the unrelenting bitterness with which he consigns the Jews to the devil, is in his case the necessary converse of his devoted love to Jesus (p. 266).

A few incuriæ may perhaps be removed in another edition. Surely it is incorrect to ascribe to the Fourth Gospel the doctrine that the Spirit is to teach nothing new, but only to recall to remembrance the Master's words (p. 178); does not Jesus announce, "I have many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now. Howbeit when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he shall guide you into all the truth" (xvi. 12, 13). The assertion that Justin read in the memoirs of the Apostles, "He was the only son of the Father of all; begotton of Him in a unique manner as Logos and Power" (p. 150), jumps over great difficulties by omitting a portion of the passage. Does the Fourth Gospel "mention the fact" of forgiveness (p. 158)? It is no part of Jesus' teaching; the only allusion to it is in the commission to the disciples after the resurrection (xx. 23). The translator's English is usually clear and forcible, but it cannot be said to be always elegant. Such a phrase as "the Gospel threatened to be sacrificed" ought to have been avoided. On p. 85, first line, in "binding and losing," read "loosing"; "roll," p. 196, last line, should be "role"; "initiated," p. 165, last line but one, seems to have lost its prefix un; and the phrase "bear a more catholic meaning," p. 89, line 4, is open to an unfortunate ambiguity, the word "catholic" being used in its limited and ecclesiastical sense instead of its apparently universal application. Such are the trifles which a reviewer must ease his conscience by noticing! Rumour has it that Professor Harnack commends this book to his students at Berlin as the best introduction to the study of historical Christianity. How many of our English theologians will do the same?

LIGHT ON THE "DARK AGES."*

IT is a rare pleasure to be able to speak with unqualified gratification and admiration of any book, but if that book concerns the "Dark Ages" it is such a pleasure as no man has a right to expect. How often one has read the weary traditional commonplaces about the decay of learning, about Gregory's contempt for Latin literature, and so forth! Here at last we have a book by a man who, to begin with, has read the literature with which he deals, and, further, has read it with sympathetic insight, and is full of what it is, rather than of what it is not. He sees in the period from the fall of the Roman Empire to the great revival of the 12th century not mere darkness and confusion, but the workshops in which the great transformation from ancient to modern culture was being prepared. He sees that the confusion of tongues, resulting from the decay of vitality in the Latin language and the crudeness of the vernaculars which replaced it, hampered, but did not quench, the expression of human experience and human passion; and he has a keen eye to recognise the life that is struggling for utterance. Instead of rising from his book with a self-satisfied sense of superiority, the reader will feel that all through these "dark ages" there were present all the conditions for great literature save one—an adequate vehicle for expression; and that, in spite of this defect, there is an almost unbroken succession of authors gifted with vivid perceptions and strong emotions, whose language, after all, was far stronger and more effective than that of the rank and file of modern translations which make up so large a part of our reading, or the elegant artificialities of the "Latinists" from Petrarch downwards. He fully admits, however, the inadequacy of their linguistic medium, but has an open eye for their humour, or their picturesque handling of the salient points of a narrative, and he never fails to detect affectation or insincerity.

But it is when, in the later portions of the book, he comes to deal with such work as the Icelandic poetry or the Chanson de Roland that his unrivalled power of arresting the exact literary quality of the thing he is handling comes out in all its force. We may call special attention to the lines on which he analyses the precise source and quality of the impression produced upon us by that unique poem, "The Sword of Agantyre," the terror and wonder of which may be known to many of our readers by Miss Barmby's translation in the volume entitled "Gisli Surson." The brief account of the Chanson de Roland and its peers as producing "stronger effects with weaker available materials than any other poetical form" seems to leave nothing for the future critic to say.

A special feature of the work is the clearness with which Professor Ker brings out the fact that even the outlying Teutonic and Celtic literatures deeply felt the influence of those Latin models which were more directly moulding the nascent Romance literatures.

The condensation of this volume will be a standing rebuke to critics who overload their subject and display their reading or their learning; and Professor Ker's criticisms, though in one sense of penetrating analytical power, are always constructive in their total effect. Criticism with him is indeed "the art of enjoying masterpieces," not that of cultivating the reader's sense of superiority over his author.

From end to end of the book there is not a word of special pleading, not a protest against the shallow estimate of the "Dark Ages" which is current, no apparent consciousness even that a modification or reversal of traditional verdicts is implied in almost every page, yet it is no exaggeration to say that if this volume of some 350 pages of open type were generally read, it would clear the atmosphere of such a mass of prejudice and misconception and cultivate so true a sense of perspective as to constitute a revolution in the ordinary conception of the literary history of the "Dark Ages" which still takes its colour from the humanist polemics of the 15th and 16th centuries.

LEADERS OF REVOLT.*

THIS able book, which consists of four essays printed in the Dublin Review, and seven in the Quarterly Review, is written by a well-known Catholic priest, whose theology naturally tinges his criticisms, but who has attained to a wonderful degree of impartiality, if his subjects be considered. He has gathered together certains prominent authors — British, French, and German—whom he esteems to be leaders of revolt against conventional Protestantism. His style is rich and epigrammic, eloquent, and quickened by a pleasant gift of humour. His erudition is wide and deep, and his essays give evidence on every page of the care and penetration with which he has studied his theme in each case.

These leaders, according to Dr. Barry, have for the most part abandoned Christ and true Christianity, to their own irreparable loss. This does not prevent him from writing sympathetically of their works and of themselves, except, perhaps, in the case of Honoré de Balzac, whom he rightly recognises to be the forerunner of Emile Zola. In his criticism of George Eliot he to a certain extent overrates his author. But he rightly points out her scarcely relieved melancholy of tone in all her books. He evidently cares much for the analytical novel, which abounds in long pages of psychological dreariness; nor has he ever noticed one cardinal defect in George Eliot's genius. She rarely makes her characters explain themselves in her stories, but requires much subtle analysis, which is a little tiresome to the reader. The essay is written brilliantly, with much sympathy and keen criticism.

Of John Inglesant Dr. Barry writes with carefully worded praise and well-weighed judgment. Here he is on his own ground, and criticises with some severity the worldly-minded Jesuit, who had so much influence on John Inglesant's career. He does not think such a one possible, and of this he is doubtless the best judge. Still, Robert Parsons rises before the mind, whose chief desire would seem to have been to maintain his authority over the souls of good Catholics. Nor can it be confidently asserted that he was in all respects more careful of his belief than of his authority.

The essay on Carlyle is not so sound in its criticism as are some of the others. It was scarcely to be expected that a devotee of the more sensuous system of Rome should quite enter into the deepest thoughts and moving inspiration of such a Puritan as the Chelsea sage. When he traces Carlyle's sadness, in part the product of dyspepsia, to the "jaundice of unbelief," he goes too far, as the careful reader of "The everlasting Yea," in Sartor Resartus, will perceive. Dr. Barry has not penetrated fully into the rugged recesses of Carlyle's lonely soul, which certainly clung to Christ if in no orthodox fashion. No doubt Christ was Carlyle's High Priest of duty, which is scarcely a sufficient reading of New Testament story. This Dr. Barry has not seen, though it may be found in many pages of Sartor Resartus, while we to-day cannot be too thankful that Carlyle has done much to shake off the chains of that medievalism to which the Catholic Church is bound, so long as it retains its present system.

In dealing with Amiel, whom he rightly calls "An Apostle of Nirvana," Dr. Barry is much more searching and, be it added, more sympathetic. He feels the pathos of that wasted life, wasted from no fault of Amiel's own, and the greater pathos of that hopeless death. When we read that "Amiel had thus quitted the firm ground of dogma and set out on a voyage of discovery," we get an in sight into Dr. Barry's method of looking at matters religious. He seems to attach a certain divinity to dogma, which it is very far from possessing. Again, in the same essay the author remarks with much truth, "The defect of Liberal Protestants is that they deal lightly with sin." No doubt they do, and in so doing they fall into grievous error. Still, the Church of Rome during its history has been prone to deal too lightly with the pardoning of sin, which seems to be a weightier matter. When Dr. Barry ends this essay by a powerful plea for bright faith in Jesus, if we may put our own interpretation upon his remarks, his plea is good and sound, and hits severely that kind of Calvinism which bases its religion on the gloom of the Divine Wrath.

The essay on Heine is in some respects the most striking in the book. The account of that singular character's struggles and mean subservience to worldly needs, of his moments of exaltation and of his despair, is finely touched with masterly precision. Dr. Barry's severe condemnation does not prevent him from doing justice to the great genius and the undoubted gleams of higher light which occasionally cheered the despairing soul of Heine; yet the final word of the essay rings with sound of bitter truth: "One thing he has proved to evidence—that genius without principle acts only as a chaotic force. And a second—that no mere Hellenism will save the world. But there his prophesyings end, and the 'rest is silence.' Euphorion is shattered to pieces, the poet's garment becomes a winding-sheet, and the broken lyre murmurs the music of an eternal Requiem."

The next three essays deal with "The Modern French Novel," "French Realism and Decadence," and "Pierre Loti." The same moral rings through each of them; the authors criticised are descendants of Rousseau. Each represents one side of their literary father and each has something of the unreal taint which vitiates his finest writing. The genius of Victor Hugo is freely admitted, and his false sentimentalism is as strongly condemned. Dumas Père has to stand at the whipping-post for a brief but severe castigation, why, it is not easy to understand. George Sand's romances are spoken of in somewhat slighting terms, while her perfect pictures of country life are as liberally praised. The school of realists is grimly depicted with to the full as much censure as appreciation, and Balzac, the greatest of the school, is a little under-estimated. Flaubert and a host of minor chieftains appear to be banished with appreciation of their great talents and condemnation not a whit too stern of their loose moral perceptions. Dr. Barry must have read deeply in that nauseous school of French problem-writers, which seems to be slowly infecting a certain number of British novelists. The essays must be read to be appreciated. The one on Pierre Loti is written in prose almost as beautiful as Pierre Loti's own, and the reader feels a keen regret that a genius of this kind should so largely have been thrown away upon a kind of writing which has no hope and can afford little satisfaction to the reader apart from its exquisite beauty.

* "Leaders of Revolt: Studies in Modern Literature and Dogma." By William Barry, D.D. (Hodder & Stoughton. 7s. 6d.)

Dr. Barry's style is clear, picturesque, and forcible. His judgments may not by any means always command the assent of the reader; but those who rejoice in good writing and wide learning displayed without any cumbrousness will both learn much and derive great pleasure from his "Leaders of Revolt."

"EAGER HEART."

IT was a happy thought and good fortune that secured the great hall of Lincoln's Inn for the performances on Wednesday afternoon and evening of Miss Alice Buckton's Christmas Mystery Play of "Eager Heart." The hall at the evening performance appeared to be completely filled, and no surroundings could have been better fitted for the rendering of this beautiful piece, with no suggestions of a modern stage, but everything to add simplicity, seriousness, and dignity to the old legend, presented as a parable of the abiding truths of the religious life.

A curtain, as of old tapestry, hung in front of the principal stage, but did not reach to the lofty open roof, in which the dim light added a sense of space to the setting of the Mystery. Steps leading up to the curtain were used in the performance, not only for the Prologue to speak his words of introduction and closing admonition, but for the approach and part of the action of the chief characters in the piece, for the curtain in two of the three scenes represented the entrance to the house of "Eager Heart." At the back, through a translucent curtain, appeared the forms of white-robed angels joining in the Christmas hymn of praise.

The music, which began with the old carol, "God rest you, merry gentlemen," sung by an invisible choir, was taken chiefly from Bach's Christmas Oratorio, opening with the Pastoral Symphony, while passages from the Gloria in Excelsis were sung throughout the progress of the mystery. There were also four chorales, and at the close the hymn (in modern version), "O come, O come, Emmanuel," in which the audience were asked to join.

Of the Mystery itself we have spoken further in our leading article, and can only add a note or two here on the performance. "Eager Heart," a simple, white-robed girl, was a beautiful contrast to her two sisters, "Eager Fame" and "Eager Sense," and her final welcome to the poor labourer and his wife and child was rendered with true feeling. The climax of the piece is when the shepherds and the three kings, with "Eager Heart" meet at the door of her humble dwelling in the narrow city street, into which she had bidden the poor wanderers, and when the curtain is withdrawn it is found that they were the Holy Family in another guise. With silent adoration the kings and the shepherds in turn make their offerings to the child, while the song of the hidden choir is heard, and finally they lead "Eager Heart" up to the mother, and leave her there. Mary's gesture, as she received each in turn and showed them her child, was with exquisite grace. The pale mother, with the look of awe and pride upon her face, and the subdued rapture of unutterable joy, appeared to us perfectly presented.

The only thing that we seriously wished different, beyond some difficulty in managing the lights, was the attempt both of the shepherds and the kings to speak some of the speeches in chorus. One voice speaking as the representative of a group would be far more impressive.

We are glad that others will have the opportunity of seeing this Mystery play before Christmas, for it is to be repeated at Lincoln's Inn Hall on the afternoon and evening of Wednesday next. Admission by ticket only (10s., 7s. 6d., 5s., and 2s.) to be had at the Montagu Fordham Gallery, 9, Maddox-street, Regent-street, W.

CLIMBING MOUNTAINS.—II.

LEARNING to read is climbing a mountain, and the letters of the alphabet and the rules of grammar and the spelling of words are the steps up which you are to climb. Sometimes you think it is too stiff, and that you would prefer to play down below in the valley. Or when you grow older you may be strongly tempted to wander along bye-paths where the scenery is artificial and the atmosphere unhealthy, and the influences immoral—as in a considerable section of our present-day literature; but f you will persevere and get to the highest point yet known you will feel the very breath of heaven about your brows, and, like Moses of old, you will gaze upon the promised land, the land flowing with milk and honey. It is that topmost breeze you need to breathe, and that top view you need to get, though you should have your eyes open to the variety of scenery visible as you mount up higher and higher.

I daresay you have heard people who have travelled say that when you reach a certain elevation you can walk twenty miles nearly as easily as you can ten miles on a lower level; the air is so rarified that you seem to have wings almost. That is just what happens on all sorts of mountains—when you have climbed up a certain distance you can work more and faster. Why, you remember very well how difficult it once was for you to read even your nursery rhymes when you had to spell the simplest word before you could pronounce it. You were only a very little way up the mountain then, and now you know that the higher you get the more and the faster you can read and the better you can understand. Never forget, however, that the top of the mountain is away up in the clouds—nay, above them—and you must never give up attempting to reach the top.

I have no doubt you could now think of other things that are similar mountains, and up which you are climbing every day. One of them is called obedience, and another love, up which some boys and girls find it extremely difficult to ascend; but their heights stretch right up into heaven, so that those human beings who do reach the top become divine and Godlike. You know how hard it is to always do what you are told to do, and always to love as you ought to love; but I want you to remember this talk of mine, and when in future you find yourselves on the point of disobeying or hating, pull yourselves together and say, "No; it's a mountain I've got to climb if I would become an honourable man or woman, and I mean to get to the top." Do this, and you will find life full of happiness and profit. The higher you go the happier you will be.

Truth is another such mountain, and many folk find this extremely difficult. I know some little boys and girls who have got scarcely any way up it yet. They have climbed up it a little way now and again, and then they have become so giddy that, treading upon a loose pebble, they have slipped and rolled over and over to the bottom; and the worst of it is their little friends are leaving them behind, making higher ascent every day, and unless those whom I have mentioned do not seriously change their ways and climb with a steady determination they will soon feel lonely and forsaken.

You see, I am speaking in parables, and I want you little ones to complete my task by going to your parents and asking them about it. Old people as well as young sometimes overlook the fact that the progress of human life is like climbing mountains, and that very few, alas! ever get to the top. Once there you can look the world in the face, as it were, and know that God is with you.

Sorrow, disappointment, and pain are mountains. Until you climb them they stand as barriers in your way, threatening to overwhelm you, shutting out God's invigorating light; but brush away your tears, and climb in hope and trust, and there at the top is the light, and, instead of gloom and pain, brightness and joy shall be yours.

Every day of our lives we ought to be higher up the mountain of a pure and useful life. If you would become perfected in spiritual things you must ascend. Clearness and distance of vision are to be had higher up. In the valley the horizon is limited. As we advance in physical stature, so also should we advance in mental, moral, and spiritual things. Earth is our starting point, but not our goal. Just as birds are created for flying and fishes for swimming, so men and women are created for climbing to higher and nobler things. If you brought me a bird I never saw before I could tell by the shape and size of its wings whether or not it was meant to fly; and so an examination of humanity reveals the fact that it is by nature an aspiring thing, capable of becoming wiser and richer in moral and spiritual possessions. It is evidently created for climbing up those mountains I have enumerated, and proclaiming by its achievements that it is of divine origin.

There are many wonderful things in this world, but, next to the God who made us, the human soul is the most wonderful of all. You little ones, as well as your elders, are each a soul. Vow that you will do nothing to disgrace it, but through all the years seek strenuously its development and its ascent to that Pisgah height from which God's promised land may be viewed.

ADVENT.

IN the fashion of an old Mystery Play, but with a heart alive to present-day needs and a faith steadfast and clear-shining amid the confusions of modern thought, Miss ALICE BUCKTON has brought home to us once more in beautiful form the old, old lesson of how alone the Christmas festival can be truly kept. They are fortunate who can see the Mystery Play as it was performed on Wednesday in the Hall of Lincoln's Inn; but, apart from that, we must hope that the text of the play* will find many readers in the coming Christmas time.

Eager Heart, in simple faithfulness and humble self-forgetting love is counted worthy of the Divine Vision, while her sisters, of worldly glory and sensuous pleasure, are shut out until they have learnt the true lesson of humility and service. Even the three kings of the old story, who represent Power and Wisdom and Inspiration or Love, which under many forms seeks the good in all, do not receive the full measure of bliss granted to the lowly maiden; they indeed, with the shepherds, see the vision for a moment, but she is left within the shrine. That holy place is simply her own home in a common street of the city, where in the night of expectation, looking for the King in his glory, she had given shelter to a weary and homeless working man and his wife and little child. When she returns from her search, having met the shepherds, and is joined by the three kings at her door, there, in place of the humble folk whom she had left, she finds the Holy Family, the vision of Eternal Love, "in tender likeness of a Child."

When Eager Heart refuses to follow Eager Sense and Eager Fame and remains quietly in her own place, a secret voice has already been whispering to her that the King is near, and may come even to her humble tenement. When her worldly sisters are gone, she listens:—

'Tis very still. The night is dead asleep;
Shut are the streets! Only the stars above
Seem strangely near, as if they, listening, heard
A far-off music. Hark, what a sudden burst
Of voices from the hills! The simple folk Bring Him upon His way. He comes! He comes!
Sure 'twas the mighty shout of warrior-kings
That ride with Him! O let me forth to see,
And mix my feet with those that throng His road,
Praying that He will deign to pause Him here,
One moment, at my threshold, blessing it,
Even with His look.

Then she goes forth leaving her room prepared, but on the very door-step finds the poor suppliants for shelter, whom, after an inward struggle, she cannot refuse to receive and let them have what she had prepared for the King.

Nay, speak no more! It shames me! Pray you come!
Yours is the Bread, the Water, and the Wine,
The lowly couch on which I thought to lay
The beauty of my Lord! Enough! Enough
That you have need, and I the hand to give!
Be you my honoured welcome guests to-night.
Forgotten be all else! My foolish dream!

As, after that act of self-forgetting kindness, she goes out, she looks up at the stars:

O star of heaven, so still, so pure, so high;
How art thou near to-night! Is it through pity
Thou shinest on me thus? or is it in joy?
Hark to the voices singing! Let me go!

But she returns, baffled, from her search; only to find, however, as we have already said, that the King after all is there, even in her own home.

The parable is beautifully worked out, and touches the deepest sympathies. We welcome it as entirely in keeping with the spirit in which we should all desire to keep the coming festival, speaking to us with a fresh and helpful voice. It does not answer any of the practical questions of our day, as to how we are to meet the pressing needs of poverty and loneliness and sorrow, but does what there is such constant need of doing—wakens with new and searching power the true impulse and determination of love that will not be refused and must find some way to help.

For all alike, whatever be the opportunity and the means of helpfulness, the Divine law is the same. Love alone can rule, and overcome the evil, in brotherly kindness, making peace on earth. Every earnest effort for the common good has part in the great enterprise, whatever is wisely done to cleanse and uplift the life of the people, in city and village alike, for the right ordering of the conditions of work and the sharing of the good gifts of life, for conciliation and mutual understanding and co-operation between class and class, and between nation and nation; whatever is done for the children, to teach and to guard against every form of cruelty and wrong.

The impulse of giving, in self-forgetful love, is always true; only it must seek to give with wisdom, that it may be with all the fulness with which love can give. At this season many special appeals are made to the heart of brotherly kindness, and we are always glad to ask special consideration for such appeals as those made in our columns these last three weeks, by faithful men who are giving their lives in the humble places of labour among the poor of great cities. This year their appeal has special urgency, and it would be a happy prelude to other earnest endeavours, and to the home joy of this season, to give to it a prompt and abundant response.

Here also "Eager Heart" may say the closing word, through the voice of the old man of the Prologue:—

The play is out; the faithful feed in bliss;
The foolish turn to find true nobleness:
Say, gentle listener, at this Christmas tide,
Is your heart ready? Are your doors flung wide?
Hath He come in with you to make His stay,
Or hath He passed already on His way?

Nay, let us enter in, before we part,
And pray together here with Eager Heart,
That never, O thou Son of Man! May we Weary of search, or miss of seeing Thee
In every human form, and human dress—
The Homeless Child of Peace and Righteousness!

A TIMELY OBJECT LESSON.

GREATLY as one must naturally sympathise with the present distress in the sugar industries, one cannot but recognise its immense political value at the present moment as an object lesson in the evil effects of protective legislation. If their experience leads the country to realise the worthlessness of the assurances so cheerfully given that protective imposts on food will not raise food prices, employers and workmen in the confectionery industries will at least have the consolation of knowing that their sufferings have not been in vain. When the Sugar Convention came into force in September of last year THE INQUIRER ventured to point out its inevitable effects upon prices: "Henceforth," we said,

"sugar artificially cheapened by the export bounties of foreign countries will be refused admission at our ports. Every sugar-exporting country but Russia, Denmark, and Argentina has agreed, at our instigation, to offer us no more presents of this character, and the result is that henceforth we shall pay substantially more for our sugar and articles manufactured from sugar than has hitherto been the case. : : :

"For the sake of a few sugar growers in the West Indies, who would be much more profitably employed in growing fruit, we have partly cajoled and partly coerced other countries into withholding from the millions of these islands, to whom the boon means so much, the advantage of buying a staple article of diet."

—And, we might have added, the raw material of many important industries

* "Eager Heart, a Christmas Mystery Play," by A. M. Buckton, author of "Through Human Eyes," "The Burden of Engela," &c. Methuen & Co. 1s. net. A brief notice of the performance at Lincoln's Inn on Wednesday will be found in another column.

This suggestion that the price of sugar would be raised by the Convention Mr. FRANK PRESTON, speaking "as one who knows something about sugar," was good enough to characterise in our columns as a "mis-statement," adding that

'those best competent to judge are satisfied that the Sugar Convention will not only not raise the average price of sugar in the future, as compared with the average price of the last ten years, but are equally satisfied that the price in the future will be considerably less than would have been the case if what you justly describe as the "pernicious bounty system" had been allowed to continue."

Mr. PRESTON concluded with an expression of regret that THE INQUIRER "should commit itself editorially to statements about affairs of which it has so little information." We recall this little episode simply because it affords a concrete example, within the direct knowledge of readers of this journal, of the kind of controversy which was going on from the time of the inception of the Convention to the date of its final coming into operation. Mr. PRESTON'S view was that held by Ministers themselves, and by all who were interested in the abatement of foreign competition with the Colonial product, while the view expressed by ourselves was expressed also, with infinitely greater weight and authority, by the representatives of the sugar-using and sugar-retailing industries, as well as by leading political exponents of Free Trade principles.

Now, what are the facts? Messrs. ROWNTREE, of York, whose knowledge of the subject Mr. PRESTON will readily admit, state that while the average price of sugar delivered at York during the five years ending in 1900 was 11s. 8d. per cwt., its price on Nov. 14 during succeeding years has been :—

1901, after the imposition of the sugar tax	13	2½
1902	13	7½
1903, with the Convention just begun	15	0
1904, with the Convention in full swing	20	4½

This last price may or may not prove the high-water mark, but no one, we imagine, expects that it will drop so far as to bring down the average price to its former figure. The result of this steady increase in the price of the raw material has been a series of failures among smaller manufacturers in the confectionery and allied trades, large loss of employment among the operatives, a diminution of profit among the surviving manufacturers, which must result after the temporary Christmas boom in a general raising of prices—all this, of course, in addition to the increased cost of the sugar itself as a food, estimated already at 6d. a week to each working-class household, over and above the sugar-tax. It must not be forgotten, also, that the great volume of bounty-fed sugar which we are prohibited from importing is finding a market in other countries outside the Convention, such as Switzerland, where a new confectionery industry is consequently springing up to compete successfully with our own products in the foreign market, and probably even at home. It must be remembered, finally, that the present dearness is not due merely to the enhanced price caused by the withdrawal of bounties by the signatory Governments, and the exclusion of sugar from those countries where bounties are maintained, but to the artificial scarcity which speculators are enabled to create by this legislative limitation of our sources of supply.

We have here, then, in this sugar legislation, an object lesson, absolutely perfect and complete, of the truth of the Free Trade contention as to the inevitable effect of Protection upon home industries and home food supplies. The Sugar Convention did not actually put a protective tax on imported sugar, and the tax established a year or two earlier cannot itself be called protective, inasmuch as sugar is not grown in the British Isles, and there was no discrimination in favour of Colonial growers. But the abolition, at the instance of the British Government, of bounties paid by foreign Governments on sugar sent from their country to ours had exactly the same financial effect as a discriminating tax in favour of our non-bounty-fed Colonial producers, while the decree against Russian and Argentine products is exactly on all fours, so far as its effect on our market is concerned, with the imposition of a prohibitive tax. When, therefore, our statesmen propose this or that new tax in order to prevent unfair competition with home manufacturers, or to show our affection for the Colonial grower, the public will henceforth know from experience that this means increased cost to the consumer and increased difficulties for industries dependent on the cheapness of the commodity affected; and no amount of assurance to the contrary, whether from interested or disinterested people, will persuade it to the contrary. The elementary arithmetical facts that $3 + 1 = 4$, and $3 - 1 = 2$, and the elementary laws of economic science based upon them, remain true in face of any amount of expert opinion of traders in, or manufacturers of, the particular articles these numerals may happen to represent; and the man in the street may safely pin his faith to them, and build his prophecies upon them, without fear that events will prove him wrong and the expert right. That is the moral of the Sugar Convention, and, in face of the present Protectionist propaganda, it is a moral cheaply learned at the price of the present distress in the confectionery industries.

HONOUR the child! on this principle all good education rests.—Channing.

WORKING WOMEN AS CO-OPERATORS AND CITIZENS.*

THE co-operative movement has always afforded its members opportunities for wider life and responsibilities, as well as economic and educational advantages. But before the formation of the Women's Co-operative Guild in 1883 these advantages were not shared by women co-operators, who, as buyers at the store, were the chief supporters of the movement. It was owing to the desire to take a more active and intelligent part in the work of the movement that a few co-operative women joined together and started the organisation which now has a membership of 18,600 women and 363 branches in England and Wales.

The Guild, like the movement† to which it belongs, is a democratic organisation, "ruled by its annual congress through a central committee of seven, elected by all the branches." The self-governing character of the Guild is greatly appreciated by its members, who say, "We have none of the so-called 'upper ten' ruling us," and "If in a Guild branch there was any feeling, 'I'm above you,' then I think it would spoil the harmony of the branch at once, and a person who took that line would be marked up." One of the Guild presidents began work at eight years old, another was a full-timer at ten, a third began work as a "winder" at six and a half, and a fourth as a domestic servant between ten and eleven.

Miss Llewelyn Davies, who has been general secretary for the last fifteen years, in the little book under notice, tells the story of the growth of the movement. In the chapter entitled "Personal and Domestic," glimpses are given into the lives of typical Guild members. One, a Poor Law Guardian (31 Guild members are Poor Law Guardians) says: "Most of my lectures and addresses have been thought out when my hands have been in the washtub, when baking, or cleaning out my rooms." When a woman has to be mother, maid of all work, mender, organiser, and economist all in one, "she must work very systematically : . . or everything would get into a muddle." It is difficult for these generals of the home to leave their post for a day or two, but it is still more difficult for them to resist the attractions of the Guild Annual Congress. A Southerner writes: "When I leave my husband for a Guild Congress I prepare plenty of food, and my son's wife looks in on him. . . He takes no harm, trust a man for that."

* "The Women's Co-operative Guild." By Margaret Llewelyn Davies. Price, post free, 1s. 3d. (P. S. King, Orchard House, Great Smith-street, Westminster; and the Guild Office, Kirkby Lonsdale.)

† The following particulars about the Co-operative movement are given by the writer in her Introductory note: "There are 1,481 Industrial Co-operative Societies in England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, with a membership of 1,987,768 men and women. The English Co-operative Wholesale Society, Limited, is a federation of 1,133 societies with a membership of nearly a million and a half men and women. It has yearly imports to the value of £5,780,935, and yearly sales of over £19,000,000. It manufactures one-sixth of all the articles it sells to the stores, and owns seven steamers, is its own banker, has thirty-five factories, and directs the labour of 13,133 employés. The government is controlled by quarterly meetings of delegates representing Co-operative Societies, and is carried out by a Board of Directors."

The Guild branch meetings are held weekly and fortnightly, and many testimonies are given of the benefit which members derive from attending them. A Lancashire woman says :—

By goin' t' meetings an' mixin' among folks aum better able to teach mi childer those things awf fun' out to be true. And its made me feel a fitter mate for mi husband, becose when he comes whoam at neet un tells me what's goin' on i' th' toun, au can harken an' raison back wi him about things at consarns us augh.

Another member says: "I have come to Guild many times not knowing how I got there, I was that tired, but I felt stones' weight lifted off my shoulders after." A member who, until she was made a branch secretary, had not written half a dozen letters, now writes some of the best letters received at the Guild office.

The study and discussion of co-operative principles and practice at the Guild meetings and conferences have taught co-operative women their power and responsibility as an organised body of consumers. Guild members are urged to be loyal in purchasing at the stores, to insist on being provided with co-operatively made goods, in the manufacture of which trade union conditions of labour are observed, to watch over the interests of store and other co-operative employees, and to discourage any but strictly cash dealing in the store. In addition to its co-operative propaganda, the Guild has taken up various citizen and labour subjects, such as public health, Poor Law, housing, factory legislation, &c. It is a strong advocate of women's suffrage, and last year it organised, with other women's organisations, a mass meeting of women in the Free Trade Hall, Manchester, in favour of Free Trade.

A subject which the Guild has taken up with great ardour is that of "Co-operation in Poor Neighbourhoods," and the chapter bearing this title is one of the most interesting in the book. It gives an account of an experiment made by Sunderland co-operators, who, two years ago, opened a store, with a hall and accommodation for two resident workers attached to it, in one of the poorest parts of the town. Referring to this work, the writer says :—

To sum up what so far seems to have been proved . . . we may say that it is possible to win the trade of the poorest; that such trade is a financial gain to the whole society; that the store is a sure means of gaining the confidence and friendship of the people, establishing a relationship built on self-help, and unspoilt by the demoralising effects of charity; and that the store might become a foundation and centre for constructive social work in parts where it is most needed.

This plan of making the store the medium of intercourse seems to us to contain more practical and hopeful possibilities for the solution of the problem of the very poor than any we have seen put forward.

Perhaps one of the most striking tributes to the value of the Guild's educational work is the table of figures showing the number of Guild members on the various committees and boards of the co-operative movement. These positions have been won in the face of a good deal of opposition and prejudice, and unless they were creditably filled there would not be a growing representation of women on the councils of this great industrial democracy.

THE PRIESTLEY CENTENARY BAZAAR.

THE Town Hall, Birmingham, was, during four days in last week—Wednesday, Nov. 30, to Saturday, Dec. 3 inclusive—the scene of a most interesting bazaar, the object of which was to assist in raising a sum of not less than £5,000 in aid of the funds of the Midland Christian Union. Towards this sum £3,137 had been promised in donations, and we are glad to record that the bazaar bought in a further sum of £1,531, and a little more remains to come in.

The decoration of the hall was a simple scheme of apple-green and white muslin, draped over lattice-work above the stalls. The stall-holders and assistants were dressed in Puritan costumes of white and grey, with linen caps, while a pleasing contrast was afforded by the bright scarlet dresses worn by the ladies assisting at the refreshment and candy stalls. Music was provided from 3 to 5 and 7 to 10 p.m. on each day by Mr. Alfred Woolley's Orchestral Band, while a liberal programme of entertainments and competitions was provided.

The two most interesting features of the bazaar were the exhibition of art and Priestley relics, and the handbook stall. The Art exhibition, held in the basement, was, we may say, without any disparagement of the rest of the bazaar 'the greatest attraction' to visitors; the 192 exhibits consisted of paintings, engravings, photographs, &c., some of which were lent for the occasion, while others were presented for sale. Included in the loan collection were nearly a hundred objects of interest relating to Dr. Priestley, consisting of pictures, medals, autograph letters, &c., and articles formerly possessed by Dr. Priestley, such as his writing-desk, electrical-machine, sermon case, MSS., and diary. The exhibition committee are especially indebted to Mr. A. B. Chamberlain, the assistant keeper of the Birmingham Art Gallery, for the able assistance he gave them in the arrangement of the pictures, &c., for which he was mainly responsible.

The Handbook Stall offered for sale, together with a large selection of Unitarian and other books and pamphlets, the historical handbook (56 pp.) of the ministers and churches in the Midland Christian Union, to which we have already called attention in these columns, illustrated from photographs specially taken. A number of copies of this handbook still remain, and may be obtained from Essex Hall, or from Mr. Herbert New, Birmingham, for 2s. 3d., post free.

The bazaar was formally opened by Lady Trevelyan in the presence of a very large company, the Lord Mayor (Councillor Berkeley) presiding. Mr. H. New (the chairman of the committee) explained the object of the bazaar, and Mr. P. J. Worsley, jun. (the hon. treasurer), said that towards the £5,000 it was desired to raise £3,137 had been paid or promised in sums varying from £600 to half a crown.

The Lord Mayor said that Birmingham to-day was very proud of the connection of Dr. Priestley with the city. They gratefully appreciated what he did for science. They looked back with admiration upon the courage and tenacity he displayed in fighting for religious liberty and the truth as he saw it. They appreciated keenly all he did to identify himself with that simplicity of worship which all admired. The city owed much to the people who had associated themselves with the life and teaching of Dr. Priestley. They had served the city in every walk of public life, and as chief magistrate he could not help but thank them for all the great services they had rendered in the past, and were still rendering to-day.

Lady Trevelyan, in declaring the bazaar open, said that Dr. Priestley's work was varied and many-sided, but in all things he was animated and inspired by the same spirit of unfailing love of truth, whatever might be the conclusions to which it led him. He was brought up amongst strictly orthodox dissenters, but he gradually left them, and found refuge in the broader air of Unitarian Christianity. His memory would be honoured not only as a scientist and theologian, but as a bold advocate of generous and unfettered thought. His opinions were those of the most advanced politicians of his age, an age in which prosperity, and even safety, could only be assured at the price of conformity, not only in religion, but in politics. Although the struggle for religious liberty had taken new forms to-day, the spirit of unselfish and fearless devotion to the cause of freedom and enlightenment was as much needed in the twentieth as it was in the eighteenth century.

On the motion of Mr. Priestley Smith, seconded by Mr. W. H. Talbot, a vote of thanks was accorded to Lady Trevelyan and to the Lord Mayor for presiding.

On Thursday the bazaar was opened by Lady Smith. The Right Hon. William Kenrick, who presided, said: No thoughtful person would lightly weigh the importance of the influence which great and good men exercised during their lives, or their claims to be remembered by the nation or society. Such men were not only the leaders of progress, but they were beacons which showed the high-water mark of human attainment. He should despair of any nation and of any society which did not cherish and do honour to the memory of the heroes, whether of action or of thought, which they had produced. He hoped the claims of Priestley would never be forgotten for what he did for civil and religious liberty and the Christian faith, of which he was a teacher and confessor, and for which he suffered persecution and exile from his native land.

At Friday's opening, which was performed by Lady Lodge, Sir John Brunner presided. They, as Unitarians, he said, were especially entitled and were bound to do honour to the memory of Joseph Priestley, but all citizens of Birmingham, and, indeed, every civilised man, was bound to do honour to his memory. It was not the erection of a statue or any dead memorial of that kind that was the object of their desire, but their object was to extend and perpetuate the religious teachings of Joseph Priestley. Their method of what he called the extension and perpetuation of Priestley's teaching was to help the congregations of their faith in the smaller communities around Birmingham, and with that object he was most heartily in agreement. He knew by experience the ennobling influence that those small gatherings of Unitarians had in their immediate neighbourhood, and he greatly valued their teaching, the special note of which he took to be the creation of good citizens.

The bazaar on the last day was opened by Mrs. Nettlefold, and the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter presided. They did well, he said, to honour a sacred memory by encouraging homes of worship in their city and neighbourhood, which still professed the same principles of civil and religious liberty, the same devoted search for truth, the same fearlessness of authority before God and man to which Priestley gave such memorable emphasis. There never had been a time in the history of the last two generations when their witness was more needed than it was to-day.

EAST CHESHIRE CHRISTIAN UNION BAZAAR.

THIS bazaar was held in St. James' Hall, Manchester, last week. It took the form of an Italian garden city, and was regarded by many who visited it as one of the prettiest spectacles in the great hall in recent years. The scenery was valued at £1,800, and the decorators, Messrs. F. Le Maistre and Co., of Manchester, are to be congratulated on exceptional work undertaken at a very modest figure. The band of the 2nd Vol. Batt. Manchester Regiment performed daily, and attended specially to give selections at the first opening ceremony. The openers were Sir John T. Brunner, Bart. M.P., Mr. William Long, Mr. G. W. Rayner Wood, and Master Stanley Hall Brooks. The chair was taken by Councillor Herbert Partington, Mr. Henry Greg, Lieut.-Colonel J. W. Pollitt, and Mrs. W. Blake Odgers. To these a specially bound copy of the handbook was presented by the executive as a souvenir of their services. To Mrs. Blake Odgers was presented by the secretaries a photograph, signed by them, of the London stall. The first opening, as was natural by reason of the presence of Sir John Brunner, was the best attended, but the last was probably the prettiest. The platform was crowded with the ladies of the Union, the London stall, the Provincial Assembly stall, the Catering department, and it was generally admitted that for the grace of their utterances the ladies had completely surpassed the orations of the preceding days. A splendid spirit prevailed throughout the progress of the bazaar, for which our friends outside the Union are to be heartily thanked.

The total receipts at the close of the bazaar were £2,907, made up as follows:—Subscriptions from friends outside the Union, £395; subscriptions within the Union, £1,142; sales, £1,370. About £100 has yet to be collected.

We are hopeful that donations from without the Union may yet be forthcoming to our treasurer, Mr. Walter Hudson, Windsor Bank, Stockport-road, Hyde. But there is reason to be satisfied with the present success of the effort. Severe trade depression at the various centres made anything like £5,000 impossible of attainment, and the weather was certainly not entirely favourable to enormous attendances. A sign of the prevailing distress was found in the school children who visited the bazaar. Ordinarily, I know, most of these would have had a few shillings to spend on their day, Saturday, but I found many of them without even a penny for sweets. They got their candies all the same.

The thanks of the Union are due to all the Manchester friends and the representatives of the Provincial Assembly and London for interest and labour and exemplary enthusiasm which will not be forgotten by the people of East Cheshire.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A CORRECTION CORRECTED.

SIR,—Mr. Street is right in saying that my letter to him contains no prohibition. But it contains a request, and the information I supplied was used in the way I did not want it to be used when it was laid before the public as evidence. No doubt this was due to misunderstanding, and I do not wish to say anything further now that you have given me the opportunity of stating publicly what I did and what I endeavoured to avoid.

THE TUNE "WARRINGTON."

SIR,—Your readers may be interested to learn that a tune by the Rev. Ralph Harrison, of the Manchester Academy, has recently appeared in that most exclusive of all orthodox hymn and tune books, "Hymns Ancient and Modern," a revised edition which was published on November 3 last.

The tune in question (called "Warrington" after the Academy where the composer received his training for the ministry) was comprised in "Harrison's Sacred Harmony," a book long valued as a standard work in the North of England.

The reverend composer of "Warrington" attended at Windsor Castle by command of George III., and there presented a copy of his "Sacred Harmony" to the King.—Yours obediently,

JNO. HARRISON.

ANNUITY TO MR. PHILIP GREEN.

SIR,—Friends who kindly assisted by their donations, will be glad to know the result of the effort made, and what has been done with the funds entrusted to us.

The monies received, together with a little interest earned, amounted to £319 1s. 2d. this enabled us to purchase from the Legal and General Life Assurance Society an annuity of £26, for the sum of £310 2s. 2d., leaving a balance of £8 19s., which had been paid over to the annuitant. We are glad to be able to add that Mr. Green's health has sufficiently improved to enable him to do some proof-correcting work, and to make a little addition to his income.

Mr. Green desires us here to express his sincere thanks to all those who have helped in making this provision for him.

VIII.

WHEN we all have our due, a good word will perhaps be said for the casuist. If, indeed, he shall then be found to exist. With the close of the seventeenth century he began to decline, and he and his occupation are now almost gone. Yet this is an age of scientific experts, and the casuist is simply an expert in the science of duty. Like the lawyer and the physician, he is prepared to give an opinion on cases submitted to him. Unhappily for him, in questions of morals, however perplexing they may be, we prefer to trust our own private judgment.

I am tempted to ask, Is it private? and, Is it judgment? Does a man really reach down to and consult his own sub-liminal conscience, and so face each moral problem as it arises, or does he unconsciously make use of an external conscience, the common consent of his order, his party, his profession, his trade? Does he ever, for instance, think out steadily and independently the ethical bearings of such matters as betting and gambling, usury, commercialism, unionism, militarism, duelling, divorce, suicide, euthanasia, smuggling, field sports, vivisection, almsgiving, the drink traffic, the unearned increment, and the thousand and one complexities of modern conduct? On all these points the casuistcould be of service to him.

There is also the bias-difficulty. We are all weighted on one side with the prejudice of early education and early association, and are insensibly carried out of the straight line of honest inference. This moral swerving it is the duty of the casuist to expose and correct.

Lastly, there is the danger of possible reaction. There is a reflex movement by which the mind turns upon its own right conclusions, and questions its own good motives. Clough's Dipsychus is a very real person in real life. Who but a casuist can reassure the double-minded?

Duty, then, is not in all cases self-evident, whatever we may think of our powers of discernment, and a science of duty ought not to be less helpful to human weakness than a science of health, or of law. If casuistry is ill thought of now, I suppose it is because in the past it has always shown a tendency to run into over-minuteness of regulation, with a further tendency to substitute minor duties for higher obligations. The most familiar instances are "the traditions of the elders," and examples hardly less glaring may, I believe, be gathered from the Talmud, and from Roman and Calvinistic treatises. On the other hand, what a healthy casuistry was that of John the Baptist preaching in the wilderness! He was not content with vague reflections and general conclusions. To each particular questioner, with his What must I do? he gave, by way of answer, a specific rule. As Bishop Jeremy Taylor, himself a casuist, shrewdly observes, "He told the soldiers what the soldiers should do, but troubled not their heads with what was the duty of the scribes and pharisees."

Is it the casuist, rather than the preacher, that the ordinary man really needs—a spiritual adviser who, like his medical adviser, will touch the weak spot, and prescribe for that, and no other? The preacher in the pulpit, unlike the preacher in the wilderness, gives the general rules of spiritual health—too general to meet the cases of special difficulty or doubt. His method is allusive and indirect. He deals with the type, and not with the single life. He never so well pleases those who are present as when he glances at the absent. I have often wished for myself that some director, some ductor dubitantium, would tell me exactly how to bring general principles to bear upon particular instances—how to "reprove, rebuke, exhort," and at the same time to be "gentle towards all, apt to teach, forbearing"; how, without offence, to persuade the man of weak and wavering conscience to decide against himself. A certain bold divine, preaching before Elizabeth, to point a passing moral, wandered a little from his theme. "To your text, Mr. Dean," called the Queen from her seat. "To your text, Mr. Preacher," is the retort I should provoke if, in preaching, I attempted to particularise. It is easier, and certainly safer, to speak of the duties of the scribes and pharisees.

The term "casuistical" must, I fear, be abandoned. It is past redemption. It is a sign left standing, to show that, in the past, casuistry has lent itself to those who wished to evade duty, as well as to those who wished to fulfil it. What we do greatly need in these days is the fearless application of the moral law to a growing number of undetermined cases. It is not fewer casuists that are required, but more; for, as De Quincey long ago pointed out, casuistry is indispensable to the practical treatment of morals; we may reject the name, we cannot reject the thing. It was, says his learned editor, a fixed notion of his that the science of ethics had been impeded and impoverished in Protestant countries by perpetual adhesion to mere generalities, and by the absence of any means equivalent to that provided by the Romish confessional for applying general axioms of right and wrong to individual cases of practical difficulty and intricacy. The notion is worth considering, even now.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

APPEALS.

London: Deptford.—The Rev. A. J. Marchant, of 37, Clifton-road, Peckham, S.E., writes:—"I shall esteem it a favour if you will kindly allow me to make my usual Christmas appeal in aid of my Poor's Purse. We are faced this winter with a great deal of suffering and privation, and the gratifying improvement in our attendance during the past year has to some extent increased our claims and responsibilities. Gifts of money, clothing (adults' and children's), books, and toys would be very acceptable, and will be gratefully received and acknowledged."

London: George's Row Mission.—The Rev. F. Summers writes:—"Will you allow me to appeal to those friends of the Mission who at this season of the year are in the habit of helping me in my work? At the same time, may I ask others to assist me in the place of some who have gone to their reward? I appeal for donations for the poor's purse, which at present are so much needed. Indeed, the hardships of this winter are considerably greater than for several years past. I also desire new or cast-off clothing, boots, &c.; as well as toys and books for the library and for the young. All gifts may be sent either to the Domestic Mission, George's-row, St. Luke's, E.C.; or to 4, Durley-road, Stamford-hill, N."

London: Mansford Street Church and Mission.—The Rev. Gordon Cooper writes from Mansford Street Parsonage, Bethnal Green, E.:—"Allow me to make my first Christmas appeal to your readers for much-needed help. My Poor's Purse is now nearly empty, and wants refilling; and I am also in need of funds to provide Christmas dinners for some of our poorer people, and entertainment for our Sunday-school scholars. Gifts of warm clothing for men, women, and children, and games and toys for the little ones will also be very acceptable. Your readers have always responded heartily in previous years to the appeal that has gone forth from Mansford-street, and I am hoping the response will be no less generous this year. I would only assure them that the need is great."

London: Rhyl-street Mission.—Dr. Read makes the following appeal:—"My Poor's Purse has now been exhausted for some time, and as there is at present a good deal of distress in the immediate neighbourhood of the Mission, I shall be much obliged if the friends who kindly send their donations for the Poor's Purse and the various beneficent activities of the Mission will do so as soon as possible. I shall also be glad to receive any gifts of cast-off clothing or books that friends may have to bestow, or gifts for the Sunday School children at their Christmas entertainment. Parcels should be sent direct to the Mission, 4, Rhyl-street, Kentish-town, N.W., and letters either to the Mission or to my private address at 22, Willoughby-road, Hampstead, N.W."

Accrington.—A two days' sale of work was held last week to raise £150, partly to wipe off a deficit on the current accounts, due in a large measure to needed repairs to the fabric of school and chapel, and partly for the purpose of forming the nucleus of an independence fund in connection with the scheme set on foot by the North-East Lancashire Unitarian Mission. The sale was opened on Dec. 1 by Mr. T. H. Gordon, C.C., of Dukinfield, the chair being taken by Mr. George Elee, and a vote of thanks to the opener moved by Mr. Wilde, both of whom were formerly connected with the Dukinfield congregation. The sale was re-opened on Saturday, Dec. 3, by Councillor W. Healey, J.P., of Heywood, with Councillor J. R. Cameron in the chair. The results were very satisfactory, the total receipts, including subscriptions amounting to £13 from generous friends outside, were £146; and the young people have determined to make up the £150 by means of a social evening in the course of a few weeks.

Coventry.—A three days' sale of work in aid of the renovation fund was opened on December 1, by the Mayoress, who expressed cordial sympathy with the effort. Mr. Montague Wilks presided, and the proceedings were introduced by the Rev. G. Heaviside.

Dover.—On Nov. 23 and 24 a successful sale of work was held at the Adrian Street Church, in connection with the ladies' sewing guild, under the able management of Mrs. Edward March, which realised the sum of £8 11s. 2d. After the sale a parcel of unsold things was forwarded to the Stepney Mission.

Dudley.—The congregation of the Old Meeting House recently concluded a successful sale of work, which realised a clear profit of over £137. Out of this sum a cheque for £25 has been sent to the Priestley Centenary Fund. Visits from the Rev. Joseph Wood, of Birmingham, and the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, of London, have been much appreciated.

Dundee.—The thirty-fourth anniversary of the opening of the Unitarian Church was celebrated on Saturday last. After tea a social meeting was held, the Rev. H. Williamson presiding. Encouraging addresses were delivered by the Rev. F. W. Stanley, representing the B. and F.U.A., and Messrs. Davidson and Stronach, of Glasgow, representing the Scottish Unitarian Association. Mr. Stanley preached twice on Sunday to good audiences, and his visit was much appreciated by the congregation.

Leeds: Holbeck.—A successful bazaar was recently held, and was opened on the first day, November 16, by Mrs. H. Currer Briggs (ex-Lady Mayoress of Leeds). Mr. F. J. Kitson presided, and a good attendance, including a number of Mill Hill friends, gave heart to the proceedings. On the second day, in the unavoidable absence of Mrs. John Ward, the bazaar was opened by Miss Blanche Kitchen, the chair being occupied by Mr. Grosvenor Talbot. The bazaar, which closed on the Saturday, it was hoped would realise as much as the last effort of the kind, and the results, in view of the depressed state of trade, have been most satisfactory, the sum of £238 11s. 8d., after paying all expenses, being available for the discharge of the existing debt of £170 on electric lighting, &c., and for the current account.

London: Essex Church.—On Sunday evening next, at Essex Church, there will be a carol service, at which the Rev. Frank K. Freeston will read selections from the poem entitled "The Man of Nazareth." On the following Sunday an augmented choir will render the first part of Handel's "Messiah."

London: Lay Preachers' Union.—A conference of lay preachers in connection with the Provincial Assembly of London and the South-eastern Counties was held at Essex Hall on Tuesday evening, presided over by Dr. F. Lawson Dodd. An address was given by the Rev. Henry Gow. The advantages of the lay preacher's position were dealt with, and some very practical hints were given as to his better equipment for ministering to congregations. A vigorous discussion followed. At the commencement of the proceedings a resolution was passed expressive of deep sympathy with Mrs. Midlane in the sudden bereavement which had lately befallen her, and of high appreciation of the services rendered by her late husband in connection with the Lay Preachers' Union, of which he had been a member from its beginning.

London: Mansford-street.—On Saturday evening, December 3, the Guild entertained 100 blind people and their guides. After a word of welcome from the Rev. Gordon Cooper, a substantial tea was much appreciated. This was followed by a little friendly conversation. The guests then enjoyed a concert, two of their own number assisting with music and recitations. During the evening Mr. Mead and Mr. Plumbridge thanked the hosts on their behalf, and the thoughtful service of more than fifty willing helpers was rewarded with the consciousness of success.

Scottish Unitarian Sunday School Union.—Under the auspices of the above Union a conference of teachers and others interested in Sunday-school work was held in St. Vincent-street Church, Glasgow, last Saturday, Dec. 3. About forty to fifty assembled under the chairmanship of Dr. J. K. Wood, Dundee. After tea the chairman, in welcoming the delegates and others to the meeting, expressed his gratification at seeing one or more representatives from each of the schools in Scotland. The Rev. Felix Taylor, temporarily in charge at Kirkcaldy, read a paper entitled "The Mind of a Child." He said that a child's mind was not like a waxen tablet on which the teacher scratched certain ideas, neither was it a clean slate which could be written on at will, because heredity was a fact to be reckoned with in the training of the children. Of equal importance was environment, hence it was necessary to study the parents and possess a knowledge of the home life of the children. Every child is a store of reverence, but we must be careful not to wrongly interpret as irreverent many questions which children put to us. They are truly reverent before knowledge and honesty, but they ask difficult questions sometimes. Should we be unable to answer these at the time, we ought at once to admit our ignorance, for by so doing can we alone retain the respect of the child. Children are imaginative, and it is one of the functions of the true teacher to conserve and guide this faculty, so useful if intelligently and sympathetically trained, so dangerous lacking true guidance and restraint. How affectionate the children if we ourselves but love them. No money can buy it, but every child responds to a look of love, and the true teacher must really be fond of the children. The Rev. Wm. Wilson, Kilmarnock, followed with a paper entitled "The Value of Lesson Schemes." He referred to his experience in London, where he had under his charge a school which met at three different times in one day, conditions which necessitated the use of some scheme or method. The chairman, followed by several speakers, testified to the excellence of the two papers, and expressed the unanimous feeling of the whole meeting that it was one of the most inspiring and helpful conferences in the history of the Union. Votes of thanks to those who had so kindly provided the tea, and to the chairman for presiding, concluded the meeting.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel.—Mrs. Frances L. Boult, the founder and hon. secretary of the Ivy Leaf Society (the aim of which is to promote and foster in children the graces of a gentle and humane spirit and to encourage deeds of personal kindness), gave an address on Tuesday evening, Nov. 29, to the members of the Band of Hope and Mercy. Her subject was "Sense, Common Sense, and Non-Sense." Mrs. Boult said how closely she felt drawn to them by ties of the past—her grandfather, Francis Morton, being at one time superintendent of Upper Chapel Sunday-school, and her father for many years a worshipper in the chapel. Asking the children always to keep their "Thinkers" clear of any taint of tobacco and strong drink, she urged them to use them in the exercise of beautiful thoughts, and suggested many ways in which sense could replace non-sense, quoting as non-sense some of the verses learnt in the nursery as indicating a spirit of cruelty and unkindness. The Rev. Hy. Dawtrey occupied the chair, and during the evening musical selections were given by other friends.

To CORRESPONDENTS.—Letters, &c., received from T. C. A., A. B., A. H., H. E. H., S. H., W. H., R. J. J., E. L. L., E. M., G. P. M., E. L. H. T., F. H. W., R. K, W.

ONE sound always comes to the ear that is open: it is the steady drum-beat of duty. . . . It says to you: "Do your work; do the duty nearest you." Keep step to that drum-beat, and the dullest march is taking you home.—G. S. Merriam.

Kilburn, Lewisham and Plumstead Church Building Funds.

AN APPEAL FOR £7,500.

THE Committee of the London District Unitarian Society urgently appeal to their fellow members of the Unitarian body on behalf of these three energetic and progressive congregations.

Kilburn, Lewisham, and Plumstead have already amply vindicated their right to exist, and are deserving of our most generous support.

Church buildings have now become essential to secure their position, and ensure their continued progress. Excellent freehold sites have been secured, and in the case of Kilburn and Plumstead wholly paid for. A church building at Lewisham will save the congregation a yearly outlay of £70 for hire of a chapel.

Energetic ministers are in charge of the congregations.

This appeal is warmly commended by the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association on behalf of the Committee.

HOWARD CHATFEILD CLARKE, President.

Contributions will be gratefully acknowledged by the Hon. Treasurers of the Appeal Fund.

The author of these verses has a leaning for philosophy and a genuine poetic impulse to say what he thinks and feels.—The Times.

An earnest thinker on the problems of life and religion. Its outlook on nature is fresh and sympathetic without being sentimental, its attitude to science, as to creed, questioning rather than antagonistic. The verse is good throughout.—Glasgow Herald.

His direct contact with nature has taught him to throw aside the trammels of conventionalism and "to come out into the open." Many searching thoughts upon mankind and the future, expressed in forcible language.—Dundee Advertiser.

It is a relief in these days of facile versifiers to come across a volume of such thoughtful and scholarly verse. . . Those who look for quality rather than quantity will not be disappointed.—New Age.

The spirit of his verses is admirable, and many will read them with pleasure.—Irish Times.

There is here quick insight of the beauties of nature and fitting language to portray them.—Bookseller.

In reviewing Mr. Carpenter's book in The Nineteenth Century, Mrs. Humphry Ward wrote:—"It is certainly no ordinary text-book, and the public at large would do wel to read it and ponder some of the problems it suggests. The real interest lies in the patient and, to the reader, fascinating endeavour which he makes to get behind the Gospels, and behind the Church, to the actual words of Jesus, and to the facts out of which the Church sprang. Nothing can be more interesting."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WELCOME Home! to the Rev. Charles Hargrove on his return from the mission to Australasia, which he undertook as representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Mr. and Mrs. Hargrove sailed from New York by the Cunard s.s. Etruria, due in Liverpool to-day (Saturday), and Mr. Hargrove is announced to preach at Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, to-morrow. As soon as possible after the Christmas holidays, we understand that a welcome meeting will be arranged in London; but his own people in Leeds naturally have the first claim.

THE fiftieth anniversary of the Red Lodge Reformatory for Girls, at Bristol, founded by Mary Carpenter, was celebrated on Friday, Dec. 9, the school having been opened Oct. 10, and certified, Dec. 9, 1854. Mr. P. J. Worsley, one of the original trustees, presided at the commemorative meeting, and an address was delivered by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, who said that 822 girls had passed through the home, of whom at least 90 per cent. had done well. He quoted, in conclusion, from a letter of Miss Carpenter's to the late Frances Power Cobbe:—

> The reason why I have accomplished my undertakings is not that I am superior, or nearly equal to a multitude of others, but simply because having dedicated my heart, soul, and strength to the Heavenly Father's work, I have never commenced anything but from a distinct and clear conviction of its necessity, and after considering fully its bearings and the way to accomplish it.

Mr. J. G. Legge, H.M.'s Inspector, bore testimony to the high efficiency of the school, and a vote of thanks to the chairman, and to Mr. Carpenter and others, was moved by the Right Hon. Lewis Fry, and seconded by Judge Austin. Subsequently, the girls were entertained to tea, and contributed a number of glees to the concert which followed.

THE Board of Education in disallowing the proposed amalgamation of Cheshunt and Hackney Colleges cite several legal decisions in support of their resolution, and "especially" the recent Free Church of Scotland case. The interests involved in the case of the two colleges are small in comparison, but the principle at issue is the same; and this further illustration in a narrower sphere may serve to remind us how very significant and far-reaching that principle is. Again, opinions of the past hinder growth in the present. The trustees of Cheshunt College are faced with the impossibility of carrying on their work effectively in the isolation imposed by geographical conditions. They desire amalgamation entirely for the sake of greater efficiency; they do not wish to alter the theological trend of their college. Nor is there any reason to suppose that such would be the case if they joined with Hackney. They would remain then, as they are at present, orthodox and evangelic, with such subtle changes only as the time spirit brings with it. But, and herein lies the difficulty, the professors and students at Hackney are not formally bound in the way that Cheshunt is bound. And Cheshunt may not in any smallest degree be freed from its shackles, except as the Board of Education points out, perhaps in irony, by Act of Parliament.

THE students from each of the colleges chiefly enter the Congregational ministry; but this is not necessary; they may be ministers anywhere. But the professors of Cheshunt have to take a pledge on their appointment and the students on admission. "Without mental reservation and without compulsion, or any sinister or worldly selfish view" they must subscribe from their hearts the doctrines contained in fifteen articles which are substantially the doctrinal articles of the Church of England, and especially their "abhorrence and renunciation of all Pelagian, Arian, Socinian, Antinomian, and Arminian doctrines and principles." Should professor or student preach any of these heresies the trustees may at once remove him. Now, in the case of the students this clause is absurd, for few men before they begin their study of theology know enough of these doctrines to say if they abhor them or not. The pledge is an idle form, and a highly mischievous one. Once admitted, no student is asked to repeat the pledge; that is to say, is not asked to express an opinion when he is in a position to form one.

HOWEVER, there the prohibition stands, and as the law is at present, it is peremptory and absolute. Cheshunt is shut out from accepting, or, at least, from expressing any truth outside the ideas of the narrow orthodoxy of the Countess of Huntingdon in 1768. What they may believe has been predetermined. The Countess of Huntingdon's Connexion is bound up in these fifteen articles, and these five "abhorrences"; and because money is involved the college cannot be freed. Let the articles and the "renunciations" go and the Connexion is gone with them. That might be a good thing. But even if it appeared good to all concerned, it could not be carried out. Such is the withering effect of the theological trust deed.

THE Rev. J. T. Sunderland, and the congregation of the First Unitarian Church of Toronto, Canada, are to be congratulated on the ceremony in which they took part on Sunday evening, Nov. 20. The church was founded some sixty years ago, and had for its first place of meeting a discarded Methodist church, and then set about erecting buildings of its own. The ceremony in question was the burning of the deed of mortgage in presence of the rejoicing people. Candles were placed on a temporary altar, and a silver bowl in the midst to receive the ashes. The candles were ceremoniously lighted, and the treasurer of the church then held the burning deed with a pair of silver tongues over the bowl, until it was entirely destroyed.

Notes on Popular Rationalism, by Canon H. Hensley Henson, is a reprint of the ten papers which appeared in this year's Sunday Magazine under the title "Reason and Rationalism from the Side of Religion" showing how such subjects as the Riddle of the Universe, the Evolution of the Idea of God, Religion and Theology, and Christ and the Church appear to a liberal Churchman. RELIGION IN DAILY LIFE.

On Cheerfulness.

He that is of a cheerful heart hath a continual feast.—The Proverbs.

And he that hath so many causes of joy, and so great, is very much in love with sorrow and peevishness, who loses all these pleasures, and chooses to sit down upon his little handful of thorns.—Jeremy Taylor.

We are apt to tell our troubles with great minuteness, while we are by no means careful to tell our joys; and we dwell upon our griefs in "the luxury of woe." Exasperations and worries which had far better be forgotten are nursed and cherished by repetition, with an energy never given to counting our mercies. For one bit of cheerful news we tell a hundred unpleasant or saddening things. We don't think of our comforts and joys to anything like the measure we give to our disquietudes.

And yet there are so many reasons for cultivating a cheerful disposition. To put it on the lowest ground first—it is much better for ourselves, even for our physical health. It is often more than half the battle in fighting serious illness if the patient is of a hopeful and tranquil temperament. Our general everyday physical well-being is greatly enhanced by looking on the bright side of things, and by hoping for the best in everything, even while discreetly preparing for the worst.

If hopes are dupes, fears may be liars, sings Clough; and even if things do not turn out as well as we expected, we shall have gained more by a cheerful hope than we shall suffer from a possible disappointment.

The power to conquer our faults, to do to-morrow, in any respect, better than we have done to-day, is largely helped by being hopeful and cheerful in our struggles.

The dinner to-day was not so well cooked as usual? What then? Don't waste time and mental energy lamenting it. Clear your mind of irritation, settle with yourself that it shall be better to-morrow, think back over matters quietly, and see where the failure began. You will then be on the track of the remedy. And if you will only preserve your cheerful equanimity, half the ill effects usually set down to bad cooking will not appear at all.

We did not rise this morning so early as we ought? Well, we shall most certainly gain nothing by sitting up late to-night to deplore the fact. Rather let us go to bed in good time, determined to have another try for it, invoking with strong confidence the mighty and All-loving Will to help our feeble will.

We spoke a hasty and unkind word to-day. Yes, it was bad, I admit. It was especially grievous because it grieved another. We sorrow for what is past, we do what we can to heal the wound that we have made. It will avail us nothing to brood over the wrong that we have done. One look into the abyss of evil and misery which our word has deepened is enough. If we gazed into it all night we could not by any effort plumb its hideous depths. The thing of greatest importance now is to gain such strength and self-control that we shall be able to avoid hasty words to-morrow and in all the time to come. Our business is reparation to our friend and to humanity which has suffered through us. We can only get the power to make that reparation by waiting in quietness and confidence upon God, till we be endued with power from on high to avoid such a fault in future.

The same thing is true of every difficulty, every temptation, every inward grief which hinders our growth in God-likeness. Sorrow for sin is a necessity of growth; but to "repent" in the true sense of the word we must "turn" also—turn from the contemplation of our own evil to look with the eyes of faith at the Infinite Goodness, and from the spectacle of our own failure to follow and lay hold upon the help of Divine Perfection. And those who have this hope in them need never be despondent.

Which of us does not know some gloomy friend. Their number, unhappily, is legion. We think of their continual fretting over the might-have-been, their morbid self-introspection, which we have to combat, their discontent with everybody's most strenuous efforts to serve them, their dismal forecastings of the future when everything is sure to go wrong. What an intolerable burden they sometimes add to the day's cares! There may be physical or mental causes for such gloom, of which we know nothing. Let us bear with such friends lovingly, striving to brace them body and soul by our own good cheer. But, for our part, let us determine, so far as in us lies, to be like that other friend whom, thank God, everybody also knows: One who meets us with a smiling face or with a sweet gravity in which there is no sadness, but which is ready to kindle into cheerfulness at a word; one who is so busy seeking the welfare of others that he has no time to dwell upon his own feelings, and who is willing and thankful to leave past, present, and future in the hands of a God who has revealed Himself to us as an Almighty Father. Such people make moral sunshine all about them, and we grow in grace while we are in their company.

Cheerfulness is really an attitude of mind, and, at bottom, does not depend on circumstances either inward or outward. All history and our own experience is full of proof that it is when people are at ease in the midst of riches they are least cheerful. They tend to become like Sybarites, and, if their bed is of rose-leaves, find fault if one is crumpled. This is especially so, of course, with those who have not learned to work and think for others.

On the other hand, there is abundant testimony to the fact that people have been cheerful under the direst troubles and in sore straits of poverty. They have learned the great secret of considering how much worse things might be. They cultivate the habit of looking bravely up to the light and not into the shadows—an unfailing recipe for increasing the sense of present blessing. So in spite of all things they are numbered among those who have a continual feast of things the most worth having, because they are of a cheerful heart, and believe in the unfailing love of the Giver of all good.

KNUTSFORD.

Readers of the Rev. G. A. Payne's "Mrs. Gaskell and Knutsford" will welcome as its companion the volume on "Knutsford," by the same author, in Dent's Temple Topographies (1s. 6d. net). It is a guide, and more, a companion, which will interest the visitor with its concise and abundant information. Here between green covers checkered with light gold is that which brings us again into the company of the characters of "Cranford," and endeavours partly to identify the particular places with which they were associated. It was a happy thought of the author's that opened his book with a brief suggestion of some of the incidents of Mrs. Gaskell's novels. Mr. Payne probably over-emphasises Knutsford as the original of the scenes, and home of the characters of "Cranford" and its associates; but in reading his general sketch of the place as it was and is, one is impressed with its romantic character so much as to wonder not at the literature it may have actually occassioned, but at the inspiration it might have afforded to many a pen turned to the delineation of Christian life and personality.

There is about Mr. Payne's book the flavour of the Knutsford that was, a distinct and apprehensible realism of the past. On the heath we catch the movement of an invading army in time of national turbulence, the bustle and confusion of villagers disturbed at the benches of the inn, the alarm of the housewives; we gain a sense of the slow quiet of peaceful times, only broken by the May Festival, when every rural artifice is procured and brought forth for the glory of a day; we know the old world. And if it is superseded somewhat now, because railways have made inroads, and by-paths threaten to become broad ways of traffic, sufficient remains for the pilgrim from Cottonopolis to make him forget his cotton, his bales of cord and cloth, and be mindful of nature and natural men, and feel romance instead of fingering textile fibres.

A word must be said for the illustrations by Mr. E. H. New. They are not specimens of his best work. The line-drawing in this case is somewhat nervous, and lacks a clear distinction of light and shade. But one has to admit even here the quality of pen-sketches which adapt themselves more faithfully to letterpress than the work of almost any other contemporary draughtsman. W. C. H.

The Christmas number of the Sunday Magazine consists of "The Master Preacher: A Romance of John Wesley," by John Cleveland.

Good Words this month has an article on Joseph Priestley, with the portrait by Gilbert Stewart, and the Birmingham statue as illustrations. "It would not be suitable in this article," the writer says, "to enter into Dr. Priestley's views on religious subjects. Suffice it to say that he had a conservatism of his own, which he identified with primitive Christianity. His influence among Unitarians was only second to Channings."

THE PEOPLE OF ENGLAND AND WALES.

I.—WHERE THEY LIVE.

THE eleventh census of Great Britain was taken on April 1, 1901; the final report was issued on July 1, 1904. Of the enormous mass and complicated nature of the work done in the interval by the census officers these articles will afford some dim suggestion. The figures are bewildering, yet the reports are packed with matter of ripe instruction; they are also, though that is not their prime intention, full of strange, strong nourishment for the imagination.

The subject itself, that of 32,527,843, or, if we include Scotland and Ireland, 41,458,721 living persons, is too vast to be easily conjured up, but we may reach it, if we describe the less unmanageable matter of the process of inquiry by which all this information was obtained; and we may understand that better from a comparison with the first census taken a century earlier, in 1801. It was forty-eight years before this that the first proposal for numbering the people had been opposed and defeated by virulent eloquence in Parliament, and fears of an epidemical distemper in the country. The census of King David afforded an ominous precedent.

The first census was a simple affair, to inquire what number of houses, inhabited and uninhabited, what number of people of either sex, what number seemed chiefly engaged in agriculture, in manufactures, or not to be employed in either way. It was quite clear at that time that ministers, doctors, artists, and others were unproductive and need not be considered. When this is compared with the papers which had to be filled up three years ago, the difference is immediately felt. Nothing was asked about age, bodily or mental defects, or other matters. Questions there were as to birth and death, but they were sent out to the clergy, for there was not then nor for a generation afterwards any civil registration of such vital particulars. The population was under nine millions. Once again the present census has been carried out by highly skilled specialists. The first was in the hands of people unused to statistical studies. Certainly in this matter Spencer's account of evolution as from undifferentiated homogeneity to differentiated heterogeneity holds good. Now this growth of complexity corresponds to a growth of complexity in the lives we live and in every function of our apparatus of government.

Most of the individuals, the "minute particulars" who compose the mass, are commonplace enough, too commonplace for the impatient idealist. The bare figures of the census are rather indigestible. We let them pass, leave them to the specialists, forgetful of their human significance. But if we can succeed in gaining some picture of these numbers, so learn to feel the myriad discrepant lives that throb under all the averages and percentages of the reports, we may reflect that it is good to look on the things of others. For it is the humdrum existence of these millions, existence often as seemingly unmeaning and unemotional as the columns of figures themselves, that makes the English character. It is of this, even more than distinctions of theology, that the teacher of men needs to gain imaginative knowledge. The study of averages is no substitute for the more personal study of individuals, but it is a good supplement to it. And a great deal of valuable as well as entertaining knowledge is gained when we consider, even under the limitations of numerical totals and averages, in what sort of environment the people live, and what may be the nature of their occupations. The remainder of the present article contains some hints in answer to the first of these inquiries.

The first broad division is into town-dwellers and country dwellers, and we find something over three-quarters of the population living in urban districts, as compared with less than a quarter in rural districts. But the urban districts themselves differ in character, some consisting of a single small country town surrounded by an agricultural area. The difference between life, say, at Tenterden and at Oldham is immense. When we speak of the growth of town population, we do not think of these small towns, or if we do it is with a sense of contrast and heart ease. It is the large towns, from the centres of which country sounds and scents are far removed, which raise misgivings in the mind. If to the rural districts all these small urban populations are added, the proportions are found to be something under one-third for country, over two-thirds for town. Of the towns, all are not equally unwieldy, but there are no less than 75 with populations of over 50,000.

The large towns are still increasing more rapidly than the population at large, and they grow at the expense of the small towns and the rural districts. It is not entirely that the population of the latter grows less, though in many parts that is the case. But there is always a natural increase by birth, and this goes largely to overfeed the cities. Thus, in a rural population of five and a half millions, there has been an increase by excess of births over deaths of five hundred and sixty thousand, but half a million of these have migrated to the towns. The closer physical proximity of man to man is shown by the Registrar-General in several ways. In 1801 there were 152 persons to a square mile; in 1901 there were 558. Or, to take his further ingenious comparison, if the people of the country were plotted out at an equal distance from one another, each would have stood 153 yards from the nearest neighbour in 1801; a century later the distance would have been reduced to 80 yards. Add to these figures reflection on the more frequent journeys now indulged in, and a conclusion emerges that great distinctions separate us from the makers of the nineteenth century. These things are not without grave consequences for religion and morals, since the changed environment, closer contact, more frequent intercourse modify deeply the inner psychic life.

We think of THE COUNTRY as a term of one simple meaning. Into the country or to the seaside people go for their holidays. The country is not the town. It is worth while to look more closely. There are many countries even in England. And different lands imply somehow different men. We will not go below the surface, but leave the study of subsoil maps to our medical advisers. But even surface variations are many and great. This fact has a bearing to be considered later, on occupation; at present we confine ourselves to the question of habitation. The total area of England and Wales is over 37,000,000 acres. Of this nearly a half is under grass or permanent pasture; if we add green crops, clovers, and other grass, considerably over one-half of the country is given up to moist, green, growing things. Less than a sixth is devoted to corn crops. Nearly a tenth is mountain and heath land. Now, an imagery of the soul is implicit in the Cumberland fells, the Yorkshire moors, or the Dorsetshire heaths. They suggest thoughts; they influence moods. In themselves they are unlike, they respond to different energies of the mind. They are, however, alike in the contrast they offer to the sombre, elm tree-studded fields or many of the grass land districts. Enough is said to outline the thought that a study of areas is a study in psychology. Another reason for the difference in the life of different districts is found in the relative density of the population. It is unnecessary to dwell on the extremes—Westmoreland, with its 82 persons to the square mile; London with its 38,795. Even in the counties almost entirely rural there are wide variations. Huntingdonshire, with its 148 persons per square mile, may stand as a medium instance, and this is almost exactly the density of the whole country a century ago. This gives a hint of the change. The sparsely populated countries afford the nearest analogue of the England of the past. The country is conservative (not necessarily in the political use of the term). Even the country has changed, changed enormously. Nowhere is there a corner of the land to-day to compare directly with the world of yesterday. But relatively the changes are slight. It is in the towns that the startling developments are presented. These dense masses of people yield the urgent problem of the age—problem serious, seemingly untoward, certainly still calling for deep, searching study. Such, then, are some of the reflections that spring to mind from a survey of those significant figures spread open before us in the census report. Before attempting any further interpretation we need to consider the lessons to be learnt from a cognate study of the occupations of the people.

B. K. GRAY.

THE December number of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong's Sermons for the Day is on "Christianity and the Family," an address given at the Liverpool Institute on Sunday evening, November 6. The second of the Rev. J. H. Weatherall's Sermons Preached in Bank-street Chapel is on "Selfish Jacob."

THREE new episcopal appointments are announced this week:—Bishop Gore, of Worcester, to be the first Bishop of Birmingham; Dr. Yeatman-Biggs, Bishop-Suffragan of Southwark, to be Bishop of Worcester; and the Ven. J. W. Diggle, Archdeacon of Birmingham, and formerly of Mossley Hill, Liverpool, to be Bishop of Carlisle.

ALWAYS there must be prayer; only at dawn it leads to labour, and at eve to rest.

LITERATURE.

JÜLICHER'S INTRODUCTION TO THE NEW TESTAMENT.*

IN Professor Jülicher's preface he apologises for the bulk of his book—though it is really by no means a cumbrous volume—and in doing so explains that one reason for its bulkiness lay in his desire to deal adequately with the history of the Canon and of the text. This subject, he says, is often held of too little account, "whereas an insight into the growth of the Canon and the text is calculated more than anything else to bring about a healthy conception of theological problems."

Agreeing in this opinion, we only wonder that the author postponed this subject till the closing chapters. His book, though masterly and precise, is evidently, and indeed confessedly, devised for those readers who without being professional are keenly interested in New Testament studies, or are ready to be so when good cause is shown. It appeals to the intellectual man in the street rather than to the critic in the study; and we should have rejoiced if, for once, the Professor had taken courage, and gone about his work in the way which he thinks best calculated to lead to "healthy conceptions." "Here," he might have said, "is a collection of writings, called the New Testament. Let us see, first, how these writings have come to hand, and with what value they have been credited as a whole and severally; let us then discover the main facts as to the present condition and its relation to the original form of the documents; and, finally, let us take each document in turn, according to such order as seems best, and discuss its contents and relationships, its probable date and author." In other words, the study of the Canon and the text seems the logical predecessor to the study of the individual writings. The case is as if a deed or other manuscript came into a public court, and the judge should first ask why it came there, upon what claim and pretension; how it was introduced, and by whom; and how far it may be regarded as complete in itself. These preliminaries being settled, the Court might profitably discuss the contents.

Well, the reader is free to adopt for himself a plan of the kind in reading Professor Jülicher's book. There is but little disadvantage, if any, in reading the section on the text first instead of last, and in reading that on the Canon before those on the several writings. At any rate, that is the plan adopted by the present writer, and, satisfied with the general effect, he commends it to others. Of course, we all come to a book on the New Testament with a store of prepossessions; but the effort to set these aside and to go frankly and receptively to the study with a guide so attractive as Jülicher is well worth making. We observe that the author has been blamed for not adopting "an edifying tone," and for not being "theological" enough. Those who miss such elements are surely sufficiently provided for elsewhere. Here one prime object has been kept in view—"to meet a want that undoubtedly exists, outside theological circles, amongst people of education, by telling the history of the New Testament from its beginnings in the simplest possible way," and confining the treatment to "essentials."

Passing over the "Prolegomena," with the remark that while this section is most valuable, it might still have been enriched by further reference to English and American writers, we find in Part I. "a history of each of the New Testament writings." Of course it begins with the Epistles, and the heading, "The Genuine Epistles of Paul," at once recalls many a battle of critics during the past half-century. On the whole, Professor Jülicher, on reviewing his work, may, like Warren Hastings, be surprised at his moderation. We judge him to be as free from subservience to mere tradition as may well be—the evidence of his candour and independence is abundant; yet after all the warfare of the past, and in face of the hardy enterprise of writers like van Manen in the present, Jülicher's conclusions are reassuring to simple people in search of genuine apostolic utterances. When it has been said that even the Second Epistle to the Thessalonians seems to the author best explicable by assuming the Pauline authorship, the attentive reader will not be much surprised to find here an acceptance of not only the "Four Great Epistles," Romans, Corinthians, and Galatians, as genuinely Paul's, but also Philippians, Philemon, (which "belongs to the least doubtful part of the Apostle's work") and Colossians. After an elaborate survey of the Ephesians problem Jülicher concludes: "Although, then, Ephesians may not belong to our unquestioned Pauline heritage, it would yet be equally impossible to deny the Apostle's authorship with any confidence." Hebrews, of course, is denied to be Paul's, but the reluctance of Professor Jülicher to hazard brilliant guesses, like some that have been made in this connection, shows itself in the remark: "We should do best simply to decline to give any answer to the question of the writer's name."

On the other hand, the author is very decisive in his rejection of the Pauline origin of the "Pastoral Epistles." Even Harnack's moderate hypothesis of the incorporation of genuine Pauline fragments does not meet with approval, though a characteristic note is heard in the concession that such incorporation is not in itself impossible.

It is when we come to the "Catholic Epistles" that the more rigorous tone is manifested. The Second Epistle of Peter is naturally assigned to a very late date, but the First is also denied to be authentic. James is equally non-apostolic, and Jude cannot be other than "pseudonymous." The Johannine literature is keenly if not satisfyingly dealt with. The author of the First Epistle is identified with that of the Fourth Gospel, and no good reason appears to Jülicher for assigning the Second and Third Epistles to another hand. The Apocalypse cannot be by the author of the Fourth Gospel—it appears to be "the work of a Christian of about the year 95, who in many places inserted older Apocalyptic fragments, more or less adequately harmonised with the context." The Fourth Evangelist himself, who was he? After a careful examination of the case Jülicher thinks he was an "unknown follower" and admirer of the Beloved Disciple, who himself, however, was not John, the son of Zebedee, but one who did really belong to the intimate circle of the disciples, "the last survivor of the band of Jesus's personal friends." The Acts of the Apostles is unhesitatingly placed late—it is a document in which are to be found "materials of faultless excellence with others that are almost useless."

These brief notes are given here to enable the prospective reader to approach the book with some little preparation, but they cannot indicate where its real value lies, viz., in marshalling concisely and clearly the various arguments pro and con, and in the fresh and candid style of criticism applied in discriminating the more valid from the less, where much must remain dubitable at best. The discussion of the Synoptic problem is particularly suggestive. Taking Mark to be the earliest Gospel, the author believes it to have been used by "Matthew" and "Luke," who, however, had recourse to variant accounts, sometimes more primitive and original. These writers also used a second written authority beside Mark; it may be designated as Q, and its date was 60 to 70 A.D., it was not a complete gospel, but contained in particular Logia, the Temptation story, and the Preaching of John the Baptist, as well as other valuable material. Probably Q had its vicissitudes before these evangelists received it; "Mark" cannot be proved to used it at all. A significant conclusion which Jülicher reaches is that in spite of Luke i. 1 ("many have taken in hand," &c.) the choice of evangelic material was really limited and our extant gospels are not the survivors from a large heterogeneous mass.

As a possible help to the class of intelligent but not professional readers the following comparison of Jülicher's dates with those arrived at by Professor Harnack is given. It should be remembered that the latter places the Conversion of St. Paul as early as 30 A.D., i.e., five years earlier than the date usually accepted. Allowing for this initial difference the two chronologies of the Pauline epistles lie very close together.

* An Introduction to the New Testament. By Adolf Jülicher, Professor of Theology at the University of Marburg. Translated by Janet Penrose Ward, with Prefatory Note by Mrs. Humphry Ward. (Smith, Elder & Co. 1904. Pp. 635. Price 16s.)

A word of cordial acknowledgment is due to the translator, Miss Janet Ward (now Mrs. G. M. Trevelyan), who has given Professor Jülicher's work an English dress in which its original freshness and force are admirably conveyed. The book is one to be unreservedly commended to the wide class of readers for whom it was written, and it may certainly be welcomed by busy ministers.

W. G. TARRANT.

RITSCHLIAN LITERATURE.*

MESSRS. WILLIAMS & NORGATE have added to their Crown Theological Library a useful translation of two of the shorter writings of Professor Herrmann, of Marburg. The first is a rectorial address delivered in 1890, and is devoted to an exposition of the nature of faith as defined by Ritschl. After a warm tribute to Ritschl's personality, in special reference to his recent death, Herrmann proceeds to analyse the notion of faith as commonly held in the Protestant Church. The Protestant Church, taught by Luther, who interprets St. Paul, maintains that it is faith which saves, but multitudes who call themselves Protestant Christians do not mean by faith what Luther meant. They mean by it an acceptance of the doctrine that the Bible is the Word of God. "A person is saved" by "holding for true this or that doctrine because it is announced as God's Word." But this, says Herrmann, is nothing else than the Roman Catholic idea of faith; it is acceptance of a doctrine not because of an internal recognition of its truth, but because of submission to the authority which declares it. Moreover, this faith always involves "the endeavour to hold the truth of what is not understood to be true," what has never been inwardly appropriated. The demand that certain doctrines and narratives shall be accepted as true in order to qualify a man for Christian faith was much more easily obeyed in the Middle Ages, but in modern times it imposes an impossible burden, "and the more sincere a man is, the more impossible is it thus made for him to become Christian."

It was the aim of Ritschl to relieve the Protestant Christian of this burden and to commend a truer conception of Christian faith. He maintained two propositions, viz., Faith saves a man, and Faith is a submission to the authority of a revelation. The revelation is not contained in any doctrine about God, but in the experience of finding God Himself.

A man can only say that he has found God when it has become clear to him from some event in his own life to which he can assign a definite date that God has therein sought him out and touched him.

That event arrives when the Person of Jesus lays hold upon him in such a way that he becomes certain of a supernatural power of love and truth, and joyfully submits to the God who manifests Himself in him and works upon him through him.

Not to despair of oneself because Jesus Christ is a real constituent of this our world—that is the real beginning of Christian faith. This alone is faith, that we become conscious of God's reality and of His grace working upon us in the fact that Jesus Christ is present to us in a simple human manifestation which can be understood of every man who is morally astir.

Herrmann admits that the historic Christ for whom he makes this claim cannot be demonstrated to everyone as an indubitable fact by the science of criticism. Christ is indeed the ground of that faith in God which is the Christian's theory of the universe, but it is a mistake to desire a ground for a religious theory of the universe which will work with absolute certainty. They who ask for this go into the Catholic Church. Every theory of the universe, even the naturalistic theory, necessitates some element of bias in those who propound it. No criticism is without presuppositions. The Christian's presupposition is given in his experience of the impression made upon him by the Christ of the Gospels, and this it is which provides him with the certainty that the Power which thus saves him is not a fiction, but a reality.

The second of these works is an address given in 1899, to which is added a lengthy appendix in which Professor Herrmann replies to critics. The address is strongly controversial, and consists, in the main, of a trenchant attack on the Romanist theory of morals. The distinction drawn above between the Roman Catholic and the Protestant conceptions of faith has its counterpart in the field of ethics. In Romanism the moral law is something imposed from without. A man is moral because he obeys a command which is announced as Divine. It is enough that he receives it as issuing from God, whether his own inner sense recognise it as inherently right or not. The correspondence of his action with the rule prescribed determines the matter. This, Herrmann contends, is not morality at all, but "the death of morality." He illustrates his contention by a vigorous and searching examination of the Roman doctrine of "equivocations" and the theory of probabilism, the errors of which are traced to the fundamental evil of regarding as moral any actions other than those which our own moral judgment dictates. Morality cannot rest on anything external. It is the product of an inward activity.

The beginning of real morality lies for every man in his beginning to live freely on his own initiative; that is, not to follow the desires which enslave him, but to obey what he himself recognises as unconditionally necessary; in other words, as good.

The moral law is a law which we lay upon ourselves because of an inward constraint. It is indeed God's command, but only recognised as such when our own perceptions affirm its unconditional necessity. The power of Christ is seen in that he produces in those who believe in him that inward vision of right which makes them free, gives them moral independence. The whole essay with its appendix is full of fine insight and penetration, and furnishes a most valuable study of the root principle of Christian ethics.

Professor Orr's volume on Ritschlianism, published last year, is a reprint of various articles contributed to magazines. No English writer has given fuller study to this subject or been more successful in exposing some of the greater defects in the Ritschlian system. Whether his treatment does full justice to its more valuable features may be doubted. The Ritschlian theology is an attempt at the restatement of Christian doctrine made necessary by new conditions of thought and knowledge. It does not appear as though Professor Orr fully appreciated this necessity, and therefore it is only natural that he should approach such an attempt with imperfect sympathies. His conclusion seems to be that what is new in the system is not true, and what is true is not new. He devotes a good deal of attention to Professor Herrmann, and after an examination of that writer's contention in the first essay noticed above, he says: "Herrmann's argument is but another way of stating the self-evidencing character of the Gospel revelation." That it is only "another way" of stating this does not surely make it superfluous except to those who are already satisfied. The critical conflict of modern times has made especially difficult of acceptance the truth that the Revelation of God in Christ is its own evidence. Much of the labour of the defenders of tradition has been devoted to the obscuration of this truth. The person of Christ has not been permitted to make its own impression. There are many whose allegiance to "the name which is above every name" has been vexed and perturbed because of their fear that concessions to criticism and inability to accept traditional explanations of Christian experience involved disloyalty to the Name. It is to "the way" which Ritschl opens that they owe the recovery of their peace. It may be, as Professor Orr argues, that the system, as a system, cannot in the long run satisfy even these as an adequate interpretation of Christianity. If so, it is probably because it is an endeavour to meet what may be no more than a passing need, and bears too palpably the marks of the time which called it forth—a defect not absent from other systems. Nevertheless, this is no reason why we should be blind to its peculiar merit of rescuing for an embarrassed generation the perception (to quote Professor Orr) "of the self-evidencing nature and exhaustless spiritual potency of the revelation of God in Christ."

BIBLE PROBLEMS.*

"WHO will teach Professor Cheyne freedom?" asked a correspondent recently in these columns. The little volume before us shows the unwearied investigator actively at work in a new field. In June last he delivered a lecture before the Churchmen's Union, addressed to those "who took an intelligent interest in the Bible, and wished to know how critical Bible-study was affected by recently discovered facts." This lecture is now expanded, and occupies 190 pages; 80 pages more are filled with very valuable notes. The last division of the lecture enumerates a series of important facts revealed by recent archæological exploration on the Old Testament, and contains two lists of passages, which students will value, affected by the application of Winckler's theory of the scribal confusion of the Arabian Musri and Kûs with the names of Eygpt (Misraim) and Æthiopia (Kush), and a cognate confusion with Tyre. The general reader, however, will find most to ponder in the preceding arguments concerning the ultimate sources of the doctrines embodied in the Apostles' Creed on the Virgin Birth, the Descent into Hades, the Resurrection and Ascension.

It has, of course, long been recognised that there are non-Jewish elements in the New Testament. The Fourth Gospel presents an interpretation of the person of the Messiah in the terms of Greek philosophy. In the series of seven heavens there is a trace of Babylonian cosmology. Mythological conceptions in the Book of Revelation have been supposed to point to Persian influence. Nine years ago Professor Gunkel argued in his brilliant treatise on "Creation and Chaos" that the conflict between the Messiah and the dragon was in fact a Christian transformation of the ancient myth of the struggle between the heaven-god Marduk (Merodach) and the great monster of the deep, Tiâmat, the equivalent of the Hebrew tehôm. In a very important essay with which he opened the new series of Forschungen now appearing (in joint editorship with Professor Bousset of Göttingen) on the New Testament, he carried this general view still further; pointed to the extraordinary confluence of religions in the Eastern lands of the Mediterranean, and declared that Christianity as displayed in the pages of its earliest literature shows repeated indications of sympathetic contact, and must be regarded as a "syncretistic" religion.

From these researches Professor Cheyne, with abundant and generous acknowledgment, takes his start. His thesis is a bold one. He believes himself able to trace the wide-spread existence of a conception of a divine Redeemer, which profoundly affected certain forms of the Jewish Messianic expectation. Under the suggestion of this group of ideas, a pre-Christian mythological biography of the Messiah was slowly formed, which was known to the Apostle Paul, and was applied by him to the person of Jesus. This included the four doctrines specified above. Before a line of the Gospels was written Paul dwells on Christ's descent into the "lower parts of the earth," or the "abyss" from which he had to be brought up; this leads inevitably to his resurrection and ascension. The Apostle to the Gentiles does not mention the mode by which the Son of God entered his human career, save for the statement that he was "born of a woman." But it is to the Virgin-birth that Professor Cheyne devotes the greatest part of his argument. He repudiates the view of Professor Harnack that it originated in a mistranslation of the Immanuel-prophecy (Is. vii. 14); and rejects the plea of Usener and Schmiedel that it was derived from non-Jewish stories by Gentile Christians. In his belief it was a story of non-Jewish origin current in Jewish circles. Needless to dwell on the ample learning and the subtle suggestiveness with which this is elaborated; Professor Cheyne acutely remarks that the Greek translation "virgin" in the Immanuel-prophecy cannot be invoked as a cause, since it itself demands one; and he considers that it was due to the prevalence of the very ideas under discussion. That these existed in Palestine itself may be inferred from Jerome's statement that the supposed cave of the Nativity at Bethlehem was the scene of the worship of Tammuz (Adonis). In the adjoining territory of Edom, Tammuz was worshipped at Petra under the local name of Dusares (Dhusharâ, according to Winckler) as "the only begotten of the Lord," and his mother was designated as "Virgin."† Egypt and Babylonia supply plenty more illustrations of the divine character and wondrous birth of the King. But the chief stress of the argument falls on the identification of the woman in Rev. xii., clothed with the sun, crowned with twelve stars, and having the moon under her feet, with the mythological mother of the Messiah.

The question cannot be argued here. It must be enough to point to this little volume as a significant illustration of the direction which pioneer study into the origins of the Messianic mythology is now taking. The general inquirer will ask for more information about the character of Marduk as a "divine Redeemer." Whom did he redeem, and from what? When we hear of his death and are assured that his grave was shown in Babylonia, we wish to know in what connexion this is to be understood. As Professor Cheyne himself reminds us, a grave of Zeus was shown in Crete; but who will ascribe to him the function of "redemption"? Moreover, if this group of ideas had already so powerfully operated on current belief as to produce this pre-Christian type of the Messiah's work, is it not strange that in the apocalyptic literature, begotten of the great hope, the figure of the Messiah himself should be so often vague, and no hints of these functions should be traceable? They are equally absent from the Psalms of Solomon. This is a serious difficulty of which no notice is taken. On the contrary, other imaginary works are summoned to support the argument. When Paul says that Christ rose again "according to the Scriptures," he really "points to a pre-Christian sketch of the life of Christ, partly derived from widely spread non-Jewish myths, and embodied in Jewish writings." In this the critic sees a reference to some widely received works not in our canon. Is it not strange that no quotation from these works survives?

We are not concerned here to anticipate the judgment of Churchmen on this daring attempt from one of their own number to trace the ultimate roots of the statements of their Creed. Professor Cheyne makes happy use again and again of the manner in which Dante spiritualises the symbols of mediæval theology. He even regards himself as conservative of the ideas which he detaches from all basis in actual history. Their forms are to be explained from archæology; but these forms are only the casket which enshrined the Christian faith in "the uniqueness of the personality of the Lord Jesus, and the immense worth of his act of absolute self-sacrifice," with the inferences which follow, "the indestructibleness of his personality, its perpetual redemptive capacity, and its identity with that manward aspect of the Divine Nature, so full of mingled grandeur and compassion, which, by early efforts of theological thought, acquired the names of the Messiah, the Son of God, the Word of God." But if the casket be broken, how much of the ideas will remain?

J. E. C.

† This is supported by a reference to Epiphanius. But Epiphanius would naturally employ Christian terminology; and our author does not seem well advised in adducing the "only begotten" of John i. 18, when the epithet is already in Philo.

PRESENT-DAY RATIONALISM.*

If Haeckel and his school are to be congratulated on nothing else, they must certainly be congratulated on having quickened and spread interest in the foundation problems of Theism. A mass of literature not too philosophic for the average reader, nor too superficial for the serious student, dealing with every aspect of the great subject is accumulating month by month. And the result, in that it at any rate succeeds in making men think, must be good. The controversy that thus is being waged is apt to pall on one at times. The case for materialism has been shown so often to fail all along the line, that one only wonders that so many still confess themselves enamoured of the hypothesis. But there are many still, and one welcomes accordingly Professor Henslow's latest contribution to the subject. One expects a treatise of more than ordinary interest from the pen of a man who is admittedly a genuine scholar and an able writer, and in this case one is not disappointed. The book is a perfect storehouse of information on every point in the great controversy, and it is full of keen searching argument.

To give a summary in a short space is quite impossible, so many diverse themes are handled—Monism, the Origin of Life, the Phenomena of Life, Directivity, the Design Argument, Final Causes, Darwinism, the Origin of Man, Heredity, Free Will, Automatism, the Origin of Moral Evil, to mention only a few. On each subject Professor Henslow has something to say worth saying, and his purpose is always consistently the same, viz., to show the inadequacy of any hypothesis that is not Theistic. As a sample of his criticism, take his rejoinder to Haeckel's argument that matter must be held to be endowed with all the qualities that men have come to regard as distinctive of mind.

Here again we have Haeckel's process of fitting the cosmos on to his atheism. Man loves, therefore love must have been an eternal property of matter. Therefore, it is seen in all chemical affinities, and so on backwards till it is traceable into ether. He conveniently fits on traits of character observable in man and animals to molecules and atoms. But if he compares the love of Paris for Helen with the "affinity" of one atom with another, how does he account for the extreme rarity of one atom only of one kind of element uniting with one atom only of another kind? By far the commoner process is for a molecule to be composed of more than one, often many times more than one atom. Thus with water, two atoms of hydrogen are always in "love" with one atom of oxygen. While in living albuminous protoplasm the number of elementary atoms in love with each other are represented by the formula—

$$C_{60}H_{100}N_{16}O_{20}.$$

Can absurdities gravely put forth in the name of science go further?

One of the most interesting and cogent arguments in the book is that on "Directivity." In developing this the author accepts the conclusions reached by Mr. James Croll in a paper published in 1872, namely, that the production of motion and the determination of motion are absolutely and essentially different; and secondly, that the action of a force cannot be determined by a force, nor can motion be determined by motion. Professor Henslow shows how this problem of "determination of force" presents itself in every section of both the inorganic and the organic field, and how it is always a quite different problem from that of the action of force. What is it that gives everywhere direction to force, so that certain specific ends are always attained, and others always avoided? "It is not the energy that conveys the bricks that accounts for the form of the house, but that which guides and directs the energy." (Croll.) Scientists who proclaim that everything is the outcome of the operation of the laws of physics and chemistry, always omit this fundamental word "form" upon which evolution depends. Here, too, Professor Henslow is one of the chief witnesses to the activity of mind, which may guide without itself being a form of energy. It is interesting to note that a similar position was assumed by Sir Oliver Lodge in a lecture given in Birmingham on October 24, 1904:—

> Life, or mind, is not a form of energy. It acts not by producing energy, but by guiding or directing it. It does not alter its amount, but, so to speak, shows it the way to go.

In an appendix to Part I. the author gives a detailed criticism of Darwinism, and expounds his own hypothesis concerning the origin of species at some length. He rules out "Natural Selection" as having anything to do with the origin of morphological structures, and puts "environment" in its place. Many, however, will not agree that this Neo-Lamarckism is incapable of reconciliation with the Darwinian theory. Favourable variations in structure always come about in response to environment, argues Professor Henslow. There is nothing in Darwinism to suggest that they do not. They are perpetuated through the influence of the favourable environment, continues the argument. But all variations in structure due to environment are not perpetuated. Some are more adapted than others, and form part of the environment under whose influence those others less adapted have to contend for life. The fittest survive. There has been natural selection. The Neo-Lamarckian hypothesis is acceptable if the word "environment" have its meaning extended to include not merely physical conditions, but the conditions set up by the existence of similar life-forms around a given form. This brings in the "struggle for existence" of which Darwin told, and natural selection.

The second part of the book is, on the whole, less satisfactory than the first. The subject is "Man," and many of the problems handled in a single chapter require a whole volume for their adequate discussion. Many readers, too, will not consider the value of this section enhanced by the running exposition of a certain view of the personality of Christ, which never strengthens the argument, and really is a matter for quite separate treatment.

The chapter on Free Will is highly provocative of discussion. The view is maintained that man only has the consciousness of the power to choose, and hence is free, whilst animals being without that consciousness are automatic in their action.

Altogether the book is one of the best that the modern monistic controversy has produced. It is a striking and valuable defence of Theism, and well worth the perusal and study of anyone.

COMMON-SENSE PHILOSOPHY.

THE "Conflict of the Philosophies," to which we have before called attention, is still raging with all the vehemence, and, in some cases, with all the recklessness, which characterises the war in the Far East. In the first article in the current number of Mind, Professor William James puts forth a vigorous defence of "Pragmatism," or, as it is now called, "Humanism," in the course of which he refers to Mr. F. H. Bradley's article in the previous number "as on the whole an ignoratio elenchi, which I feel free to disregard altogether." In this same number, Mr. F. C. S. Schiller also furnishes a very brilliant "Defence of Humanism," in which he criticises Mr. Bradley's article in detail, and more suo mixes up facetiousness and logic in a way which seems to us more conducive to the entertainment of the reader than to the furtherance of clear insight into the actual merits of the controversy. On comparing these two articles with the article which has called them forth, the conviction grows upon us that the real differences between the opposing philosophies are by no means so serious and fundamental as the writers in their polemical zeal suppose them to be. The so-called "Absolutists" and "Humanists" are simply emphasising and expounding distinct aspects of philosophical insight, each of which is indispensable, and neither of which can be intelligently and profitably discussed in complete isolation from the other.

Among the other articles in this attractive number of Mind there is one which deserves especial notice, viz., a very long and elaborate paper on "Mind and Body in recent Psychology," by Professor A. E. Taylor. The result of Mr. Taylor's examination is the rejection of the theory of the "parallelism" of mind and body which is held by many recent psychologists, such as Höffding and Stout, and the assertion of the interaction of the two. This article is one of many significant signs that philosophy which, under the influence chiefly of German Idealism, has long been attempting to invert the conclusions drawn by the common-sense of mankind, is now returning to views of the cosmos which, while they correct and elucidate the ordinary judgments respecting the relations of the soul and the external world, still leave to those judgments substantial validity.

SHORT NOTICES.

THE Nine Parables from the New Testament, set to music by Hugh Atkins, were written originally for the children of the Great Meeting Sunday School, Hinckley, and two of them, the parables of the Sower and the Lost Sheep, were given by a party of children from the Charles-street School at the last Summer Session for teachers at Manchester College, Oxford. These musical renderings of the familiar words, instinct with true feeling, should be welcomed not only in school and home, but in congregational worship. Of the nine, the last on "Forgiveness" can hardly be called a parable, but it is none the less fitting as a musical rendering of Luke xvii. 1–4. (Sunday School Association, Essex Hall. 1s. net.)

Hymns and Choral Songs, to which is appended an order for service for children, with occasional prayers and doxologies. Published by the Manchester District Sunday School Association. This is a book that has grown, and has grown into the affections of many schools, especially in the North. Since 1875 the Manchester Association has issued an annual Whitsuntide hymn-paper with occasional numbers for harvest, Christmas, New Year, and temperance meetings. There have been several issues of collected hymns, both with the music (in both notations) and the words alone. Now we have a complete edition of 412 hymns and songs, making a substantial volume, which is warmly to be commended in schools and homes where it is not yet known. Sometimes one may miss a favourite tune, or think that a better selection might have been made, but there is an abundance of music here which children delight to sing, and many hymns which are good to sing at any time of the year. The collection is specially indebted to Mr. Isaac Barrow and Mr. W. Woolley for a large number of tunes. The Revs. H. W. Hawkes and J. L. Haigh contribute both hymns and tunes. We note in the index of authors of hymns, that E. B. should be Ellen Bibby, and that No. 69 ought not to be attributed to Goethe. The number of Langbridge's hymn (354) has dropped out. (Manchester: H. Rawsen & Co., 15, New Brown-street. London: Sunday School Association, Essex Hall. 2s. 6d. net. Words only, 6d. net. Words for harvest festivals, 1d.)

Young Days has now completed twenty-nine years in the service of our children, "an illustrated monthly magazine for home and school," edited by J. J. Wright, F.R.S.L. The year's numbers are now issued in a bound volume, with a pretty coloured frontispiece. The Guild Work during the year has been on "Seed Thoughts from many Minds," and there has been also a monthly instalment of "Temperance Ideas." (Sunday School Association, Essex Hall. 1s. 6d. net.)

Heroes of Industry, A Reading Book for Schools, by Frances E. Cooke, author of "An English Hero," "A Boy's Ideal," "True to Himself," &c., is issued in the series of Ludgate Supplementary Readers. There are thirty illustrations, and the stories are told in Miss Cooke's charming manner of James Watt, George Stephenson, James Nasmyth, Thomas Telford, Josiah Wedgwood, the brothers Chambers, and Samuel Crompton. This is one of the books which make the reading of our young people such a wholesome and happy thing. It is one more added to the many debts of gratitude we owe to Miss Cooke. (Routledge. 1s. 6d.)

The bound volumes of Good Words and the Sunday Magazine are admirable as ever, with abundant variety of interest, both in matter and picture, and some really beautiful full-page illustrations. Good Words contains a series of ten papers by Canon Hensley Henson on "Reason and Rationalism from the Side of Religion." The Sunday Magazine has some papers by Helen Keller on "My Philosophy of Life." (Isbister & Co. 7s. 6d. each.)

By Still Waters, a Book of Prayer, by Lauchlan Maclean Watt, is laid, the writer says, "on a quiet grave far away." What it contains has "passed through the crucible of the sorrows of others." He leaves the prayers "to all who are seeking God 'beside the still waters.'" There is much here that may help others to pray, even when the thought is not always clear, by reason of the different "Persons" to whom the prayers are addressed. (Blackwood. 1s. 6d.)

Outlines of Pastoral Theology for Young Ministers and Students, translated and edited by the late Rev. William Hastie, D.D., is a little book which will be found very suggestive to those for whom it is intended. It appears to be of Moravian origin, and is instinct with the practical piety characteristic of the Brethren. (T. & T. Clark. 1s. 6d. net.)

A new series of books of practical religion, similar in form to the "Small Books on Great Subjects," but more attractively bound in limp leather, opens with a volume on Inspiration in Common Life, by W. L. Watkinson. Other volumes issued are "A Reasonable View of Life," by J. M. Blake, M.A.; "Prayer," by William Watson, M.A., Presybterian minister at Birkenhead; and "Common-Sense Christianity," by C. Silvester Horne. (James Clarke. 1s. 6d. net each.)

Speaking Good of His Name, by Basil Wilberforce, D.D., is a new volume of sermons by the Archdeacon of Westminster, dedicated to the working-men who attended the mid-day service in the Abbey cloisters in the Coronation year. The sermons are not the brief addresses given at those services, but on the same subjects. (Brown, Langham. 3s. 6d.)

Mr. Jonathan Nield's Guide to the Best Historical Novels and Tales received a very cordial welcome in these columns, on its first appearance two years ago, and again when the second edition was published, after a few months, with complete indexes and titles. A third revised and enlarged edition appeared early in the present year, and our admiration for the thoroughness with which the work has been done is greater than ever. In this new edition there are more exact particulars as to the subject of the books, and there are many other improvements. The work is most warmly to be commended to the use of readers young and old. (Elkin Mathews. 4s. net.)

MUSINGS.

By a Minister.

IX.

I have been wondering whether the "homily" has ever met, or can now be made to meet, the difficulty raised by De Quincey. It was his belief, as we have seen, that the light touching of mere generalities in Protestant preaching had hindered and weakened the science of ethics, had done little or nothing to apply the general axioms of right and wrong to individual cases of practical difficulty and intricacy. Some means equivalent to that provided by the Romish confessional was, he thought, necessary, if broad principles were to be brought to bear in any decisive way on particular questions.

The homily, it may be said, is just such a means. It comes midway between the set oration and the private admonition. It is, as its name betokens, a familiar talk. St. Paul is said in a certain place to have "talked with" the congregation, and this is perhaps the first mention of the true Christian homily. The word was afterwards used of expository lectures, and, when collections of these lectures were put into the hands of the clergy as aids to preaching, there was little left to distinguish the homily from the sermon. The homily was simply a sermon which was avowedly not your own.

The two Books of Homilies put forth in the reigns of Edward VI. and Elizabeth can hardly be said to have been designed to meet perplexing cases of conscience. They are outlines of instruction in sound doctrine, and of exhortation to good living, supported by passages of Scripture not too carefully selected, and cited in full. Everything in the way of deduction and appropriation is left to the hearer. As far as I know, the only instance of detailed application is the following outburst in the homily Against Excess of Apparel:—

> We are never contented, and therefore we prosper not; so that most commonly he that rustleth in his sables, in his fine furred gown, corked slippers, trim buskins, and warm mittens, is more ready to chill for cold, than the poor labouring man, which can abide in the field all the day long, when the north wind blows, with a few beggarly clouts about him. We must have one gown for the day, another for the night; one long, another short; one for winter, another for summer; one through furred, another but faced; one for the working-day, another for the holy day; one of this colour, another of that colour; one of cloth, another of silk or damask. We must have change of apparel, one afore dinner, and another after; one of the Spanish fashion, another Turkey; and to be brief, never content with sufficient.

A sentence or two might be added from the homily Of the State of Matrimony, in which there is a discussion of the point whether the husband may excusably beat the wife, and one or two more from that Against Rebellion, wherein the use of banners in times of popular agitation is stoutly denounced, together with some strong expressions concerning "land-grabbing" in the Fourth Part of the Sermon for Rogation Week; but no one will contend that there is any attempted solution here of nice and baffling problems. The homily, as we know it, fails to meet "individual cases of practical difficulty and intricacy." Nor can I think that any Homiliarium newly constructed would effectually meet such cases. There might be some gain of impersonality through the use of encyclical discourses, and, as the reader would not be suspected of preaching at individuals, a freer handling of delicate subjects might be possible, but the meshes of the homily could never be made small enough to hold any that were minded to escape. A better way must be devised.

First, if I dare say it, the aerial sermon must be given up. There is preaching in vogue which may be likened to kite-flying. The preacher plays with lofty ideals remote from actual life. They soar and sweep gracefully before the eye. There may be a thread of attachment somewhere to the Gospel of plain duty, but it is part of the kite-flier's art that it shall not be too plainly seen. Let the ideal be set up, and of painful earthly realities little need be said. I am myself, against my will, one of the kite-fliers. I would like to talk to people about their souls, the sins which beset them, and the temptations which especially befall them; but to the Athenians of the pavement these things are foolishness; therefore I am constrained to catch them with guile, and to draw them in with enticing words of man's wisdom. I say it with shame.

The next step will be the revival of religious converse. "The bishop," says an old historian, "interrogated and talked to the people, and they in their turn answered and interrogated him, so that it was properly a conversation." This is the remedy. If modern preaching is futile because it names no one, and specifies nothing, let minister and congregation confer. Let them talk things out. Let them press their principles to logical conclusions, and then to practical applications. Let them cross-examine one another, resolve one another's doubts, overcome one another's hesitations. Then we may hope that the science of duty will be advanced, and that many undetermined moral questions will be brought to bay, and elude us no more. A rich reward awaits the church which will enter on this new course.

Charitable Relief, by the Rev. Clement F. Rogers, M.A., in the series of Handbooks for the Clergy, is written by one who hopes that the day will come "when the clergy will realise the necessity of an education in social work as the result of a more scientific treatment of Pastoral Theology." From the London Charity Organisation Society, working at one of its district offices, the author learnt to look further than the mere detection of imposture, by co-operation with others, to grapple with distress at close quarters, and to relieve and cure it. (Longmans. 2s. 6d. net.)

Prince Kropotkin's Fields, Factories and Workshops is issued in an unabridged popular edition, in paper cover. (Sonnenschein. 6d.)

A twelfth edition of the Lives of Robert and Mary Moffat, by their son, John S. Moffat, with full-page illustrations and a fine portrait of the old man, appears in a volume uniform with the recent popular edition of the lives of Cobden, Savonarola, and Machiavelli (Fisher Unwin. 2s. 6d. net.)

OBITUARY.

MRS. CHARLES WILLIAM JONES.

MANY readers of THE INQUIRER would see with sympathy and a sense of personal regret the announcement of the death of Mrs. Charles William Jones, which appeared last week.

Georgina Potter, second daughter of the late Mr. Sidney Potter, of Manchester, was born in 1841, and married in 1870 Mr. Charles William Jones, of Liverpool. Her death occurred on the 2nd inst. at Allerton Beeches, near Liverpool, from heart failure. The funeral service at Ullet-road Church on the 6th inst. was conducted by the Rev. J. Collins Odgers. The funeral at the crematorium was strictly private, but the very large numbers present at the service in the church attested the widespread sympathy with the family and the affection and esteem with which Mrs. Jones was regarded.

In the earlier part of her life in Liverpool, more than one institution for the alleviation of sickness and poverty was familiar with her kindly presence and active interest in its work. But for many years past her uncertain health and frequent serious illnesses have prevented her from taking any very active part in the life that lay outside her own immediate family circle, and the memory that now remains most clearly with those who knew her must, for the most part, be a memory of the powerful influence of a generous and kindly character and disposition, rather than of active participation in the work of the world.

Coming of a good old Lancashire Presbyterian stock, she inherited a large share of that combination of genial humour, and serious sympathy with the realities of homely Lancashire life, that is found in the "Lancashire Memories" of her mother, Mrs. Sidney Potter. It was this genial sympathetic disposition that enabled her not only to bear the recurrent burden of suffering that was her own lot, but also to do much for others. The public institutions for the amelioration of the lot of the le s fortunate ranks of society, where the daily burdens of life press heavily, owe more than they are aware of to such unobtrusive yet truly efficient lives. And without intruding upon the sanctity of private domestic life, it is well that we should remember how much the world owes to those whose influence breathes upon it from the retirement of their own homes, through the lives of its active busy workers for the public good.

SPEAKING at Canning Town a week ago, Sir John Gorst said that when he became Minister for Education he learned that the physical condition of the children was deplorable and he had pointed out to the House of Commons more than once that it was useless to vote large sums of money for education when the children were incapable of receiving the education offered. Lack of food is the chief want of the children. A resolution was moved by the Countess of Warwick, and supported by Sir John Gorst, in favour of granting to education authorities the power necessary to provide food for children attending State supported schools.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

I.—THE JEWISH CHILD.

WE do not know very much about the boys and girls who lived in Palestine at the time when Jesus was born amongst them. For instance, we cannot be quite sure that they even went to school. There is nothing about schools and school-children in the Bible. There is a verse that says, "Draw near unto me, ye unlearned, and lodge in the house of instruction," and "the house of instruction" is a pretty name for a school, but schools then may not have been schools for "infants," as we call them—quite little children. If the playfellows of Jesus did go to school, it would probably be in the nearest synagogue, and there they would sit in a circle on the floor, and sometimes, perhaps, they would write with their fingers in sand sprinkled in front of them. When Jesus, in the Temple, "stooped down, and with his finger wrote on the ground," he very likely did what he had often done as a child. But really it did not matter then very much whether children went to school or not. They were well taught at home, first by the mother and then by the father, and the girls less than the boys, for they would not be expected to know so much, and were kept much more at home. One of the first things a boy would learn would be his birthday-text, a verse of Scripture containing his name, or, if that could not be, then the letters of his name. Portions of the Law in Hebrew, and passages from the Psalms and the Prophets, were his first lesson-books, and at the age of five he had begun to know them by heart.

The children of Nazareth must have dressed then very much as they do now. If so, they must have worn plain or striped tunics girded with sashes, and sometimes an outer jacket of white or blue. They must have lived nearly all day in the open air, for their homes were small, and dimly lighted, to keep them cool.

What did they have for games? All young children play very much in the same way all the world over, and as they grow older they imitate the amusements of their elders. Target-shooting is one of the sports mentioned in the Bible (1 Sam. xx. 20); the slinging of stones was another (Judges xx. 16); racing on foot was a third (Ps. xix. 5); the high jump was a fourth (Ps. xviii. 29). We may be sure the children had their own ways of doing the same things. Grown-up Jews were also fond of riddles and guessing games, as we know from several places in the Old Testament, and the children would certainly have their imitations of these. But there was one game which the children invented for themselves, and Jesus remembered it in after days, and made a parable of it. They used to watch the wedding processions and funeral processions which passed through the market place, and then they would play at weddings and funerals; but they were not always agreed which it should be; some wanted to have a wedding march, with piping and dancing; others wanted to have a funeral march, with wailing and mourning. Nothing would please them all. Jesus said that some of the Jews were like these cross children" they did not know what they wanted, and were always changing their minds; one day they found fault with him as a teacher for being too mild, and another day they found fault with John the Baptist for being too severe.

Jewish children would very soon hear about the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the God of families from which their own families were descended. This made the thought of God a part of their everyday family life. They would often hear their fathers reciting the family prayers, and saying grace before and after meals; sometimes they would see their mothers lighting a lamp on Friday evening in a very solemn way, and they would know that the Sabbath had begun; there were nights when they would stand at the doors to watch for the first glimpse of the new moon, and listen to the prayers which greeted the rising light. They had their part in the great festivals of the year; there were certain questions which they were to ask, and certain answers which they were to learn by heart; there was one day when they heard the noble deeds of the Maccabees, and wondered at the blaze of lanterns and torches which then lit up the streets and their own homes; there was another day when they ran to the synagogue to hear the story of Esther, and shouted their loudest whenever the hated name of Haman was heard. More pleasant to hear were the cries which they raised in the courts of the Temple, fragments of verses from the Psalms chanted on great days. It was on one of these occasions that Jesus blessed little children for the second time (Matt. xxi. 16). There were some pretty customs amongst the Jews which children would no doubt soon learn to follow. One was to touch the holy Name of God written on the entrance to each house, and to kiss the finger which touched it; another was to say, "Peace be with you," where we should say, "How do you do?" I have also read that the Jews would sometimes say "grace" at the sight of sunshine or flowers, or on smelling some sweet odour. Elia, in one of his essays, says that he had often felt the want of a form of grace to be said before a pleasant walk, or a moonlight ramble, or the reading of a choice book. The Jews felt this want also, and tried to meet it. It is good to remember that meals are not our only repasts or the only good gifts for which thanks are due. Jewish mothers would sometimes, if they met a revered teacher, hold up their little ones to be blessed by him; that was why "they brought young children to Christ, that he should touch them," and that was why "he took them up in his arms, put his hands upon them, and blessed them" (Mark x. 13-16).

As a Jewish boy "came of age" at thirteen years, and a girl at twelve years, childhood must have passed with them, in some ways, more quickly than with us. They were strictly brought up, and their pleasures and liberties were very few, compared with those which you now enjoy; but no children, I suppose, have ever been better cared for, more carefully taught, and more tenderly loved than the Jewish children of that day. How it fared with some other children in another part of the world, about the same time, you shall hear next week.

BROOKE HERFORD.*

A YEAR ago the veteran, who had been for so long a prisoner of hope, received his release, and passed into that light which was for him radiant with the promise of perfect love. His departure wakened afresh many grateful memories, and friends on both sides of the Atlantic bore testimany to what they owed to that life, so rich in a strong manliness and warm affections. A great worker through long years of service, a faithful friend, in the truest sense a minister of religion, Dr. BROOKE HERFORD has left a memory which will long be fragrant in many hearts, both here and in America, and we rejoice at this Christmas-time, which now brings the anniversary of his death, to receive through his daughters' care fresh gifts from him, by his spoken word to be brought once more into close touch with his brave and helpful spirit, and through the insight of an intimate friend to have his winning personality brought home to us in vivid presentment.

The sermons gathered into the volume, "Anchors of the Soul," were nearly all selected by Dr. HERFORD himself for publication, and belong to the later years of his ministry in Boston and London. The mere recounting of some of the latter, for those who knew him, will be enough to show the abundance of good things offered in this volume, in the simple, direct, and strenuous utterances of the earnest preacher, who was always the friend of his people. "The Gate Beautiful," "Goodness Possible in Unlikely Places," "Gaining Life by Losing It," "On Supplying Others' Lack of Service," "Having the Courage to be Defeated," "Everything Beautiful in Its Season" (a sermon for people who abuse the weather), "How to Regain a Lost Faith," "On Making the Best Use of Sunday," "Standing Up and Looking Up."

And to the sermons we can add the "Bible Stories," which had also been prepared for the press by Dr. HERFORD himself. He was always a delightful teller of stories, as witness his well-known "Story of Religion in England," and memories of his spoken word, which will be fresh in many hearts. These old Bible stories are told for children, simply, with vivid imagination, by one who held that there was more historical reality in the earliest traditions than modern critics have been inclined to admit. In the August and November numbers of the Atlantic Monthly of 1883, Dr. HERFORD wrote two articles on "The Trustworthiness of Early Tradition" and the "Trustworthiness of the Hebrew Traditions," in which his view was fully elaborated, and to which, in the following March, the Rev. PHILIP WICKSTEED replied, in the same magazine, supporting the more critical position. We simply note the fact here, for the sake of readers who may be interested to turn back to the old discussion. The "Bible Stories" may be enjoyed by young and old alike.

Mr. WICKSTEED's biographical sketch is delightful, and we would gladly have seen it run to a hundred pages instead of fifty; it contains some of Dr. HERFORD's own reminiscences of his early days in Manchester and, during his business apprenticeship, in France, and a letter which he wrote from college in 1848 to his brother WILLIAM, then minister at Lancaster, telling how he and TRAVERS MADGE were up every morning at five or earlier, to serve as knockers up for some factory people, and how he spent the rest of those early hours.

Recording his marriage in 1852, Mr. WICKSTEED says of the young couple:

"Both had strong personalities and strong wills, and the perfect harmony, the open and joyous confidence, which made their home so beautiful and so invigorating, was not reached without effort on both sides. BROOKE HERFORD, who always had a tendency to regard his personal experiences as the universal norm, used often to tell those about to marry that they had little notion either of the trials or of the true sources of strength and blessedness that were before them; and that they must not expect the earliest time of their marriage to be the happiest. To him and to his wife, at any rate, the passage of years brought deepening strength and joy in their relationship, and there was a robustness about the comradeship and co-operation of these two strong personalities, a breezy and open frankness which showed how their union had developed, not through maiming self-repression, and "reduction to the highest common measure," but through the welding force of mutual love, and by their bravely and loyally facing joys and trials till each learned to know and to rely upon the other's strength, and to realise the other's weaknesses, not as things to be fretted against or passively and repiningly accepted or conceded, or managed; but as things to be supplemented with a reverent love, recognised not as trials, but as calls and opportunities for that very fellowship of love in which lies strength and joy.

We are tempted to go through the memoir and note point after point in a life that was so full of joy and of noble traits; but we have said enough, we are confident, to send many readers, even if they come as strangers hitherto, eagerly to the book itself.

Mr. CUCKSON's memoir came as a surprise across the Atlantic even to the members of Dr. HERFORD's family. It is the warm tribute of an old student in Manchester and a fellow-minister in America, who succeeded Dr. HERFORD for a time in his Boston pulpit. The little book contains three portraits and a picture of the HERFORDS' charming summer house at Wayland, Mass. There is a capital portrait also in the volume "Anchors of the Soul."

PEACE SUNDAY, 1904.

TO-MORROW is the day which the advocates in England of international peace have agreed to set apart, in accordance with their annual custom, for the re-consecration of their endeavours by special services and sermons in so many of the churches and chapels of our land as are willing to take their part in the movement. What will be the view of the preachers and their hearers of the effect of events since Peace Sunday, 1903, on the prospects of their cause? To many, no doubt, the awful war in the Far East will seem to eclipse all hope and to show the utter futility of the high expectations based on the great Hague Conference of 1899. For others, possessed, as it seems to us, of longer and surer vision, that vast cataclysm, momentous as it is, will not obliterate other and more hopeful signs—will, indeed, appear as itself a factor of no little importance in strengthening the demand for a saner method of adjusting differences between nation and nation.

Of a truth, the war in the Far East is a grim enough sequel to the fine talk with which the Powers inaugurated the Hague Tribunal. One of the combatants was actually the convener of the Conference—the self-appointed leader of the nations along the paths of peace. The other is a people over whose accession to the ranks of the "civilised" Powers—over whose emancipation from the trammels of Eastern "barbarism"—Western commentators have rejoiced with so self-applauding a joy. And these two Powers have thrown themselves into the struggle with a reckless prodigality in the expenditure of human life which establishes a new era in the annals of warfare and falsifies all previous theories as to what is possible or impossible in attack or defence. We were told that the destructive power of modern weapons of offence was such that no two first-class Powers dare in future appeal to their arbitrament, and that if, in a moment of madness, they made the appeal, a week's experience of its awful meaning would bring them to terms. Yet the present war has gone on month after month, the carnage has been more awful than the wildest imagination could have conceived, and still the determination of either side to continue the fight till its demands are conceded seems unabated.

And yet, may it not be that the very awfulness of the conflict—the realisation by the world of what warfare on a great scale must mean in this twentieth century—will prove in the end to have been a more potent factor in securing the ultimate substitution of saner methods of settling international disputes than any number of high-sounding resolutions and declamatory toasts by Kings and Chancellors? On the morrow of the second great battle of the campaign, when a decisive victory appeared to have been won by Japan, it was reported from Tokio—

"That even the Japanese, to whom a great victory is of paramount importance, seem shocked by the slaughter of their enemies. No shouts of triumph are raised in the streets and few flags are flying. A procession in honour of the victory may be seen later on, but many expressions against the holding of any demonstration were heard to-day."

Everywhere in Christendom one hears of the same feeling. Delight in the story of battles, pride in the heroism of attacker or defender, interest in the success or failure of this or that strategic theory, all seem swallowed up in the one overwhelming sense of the awfulness and uselessness of such wholesale slaughter.

There was great and widespread exasperation in England when defenceless fishermen, pursuing their avocation on the Dogger Bank, were shot down by Russian warships possessed by the fear of attack by invisible torpedo boats. But there was no mistaking the deep relief of the whole nation at the successful reference of the whole incident to a peaceful Court of Inquiry. If we are right in lamenting that the convener of the Hague Conference is one of the combatants in the greatest war this generation has seen, and that the country which took the foremost part in the evolution of the Hague Tribunal should have been the first to demonstrate its impotence by the war in South Africa, we are surely right also in rejoicing that it should fall to England and Russia to be the first to refer a dispute capable of bringing about war between first-class Powers for examination by means of the machinery there set up. Who shall doubt that our own experience in South Africa, no less than the awful drama dragging itself out in Manchuria, was a decisive factor in securing this happy result?

We must beware of attaching excessive importance to the network of arbitration treaties now in course of formation. Most vital causes of dispute are expressly excluded from their scope. But at least they constitute one step farther in the direction of universal arbitration, and provide the groundwork for more effective treaties in the future. The second Peace Conference, proposed by President Roosevelt, is likely to be more concerned in amplifying and codifying the law as to contraband and the rights and duties of neutrals in wartime, than in facilitating mutual disarmament or universal arbitration. But its work is by no means to be despised on that account by the friends of peace, neither is it to be assumed that the limitation of armaments is, therefore, beyond attainment. Such limitation is more likely to be attained by negotiations over particular naval budgets than by World's Congresses, and should not be beyond the powers of Ministers who mean business. The next British Government will almost certainly take office with a direct mandate from the country to exhaust all possible means of lessening the present ruinous expenditure on armaments, and agreements between rival naval Powers for the curtailment of their shipbuilding programmes are by no means as unlikely a method of attaining that end as some people would have us suppose. If with a fuller and more sober realisation than five and a half years ago of the magnitude and difficulty of the task before them, it should nevertheless not be without high hopes for the future of their cause that the friends of peace will review the outlook on Peace Sunday, 1904.

THIS wonderful property of our religion is to be explained by its being founded on, and answering to, the primitive and most universal principles of human nature. It reveals God as a parent; and the first sentiment which dawns on the child is love to its parents. It enjoins not arbitrary commands, but teaches the everlasting principles of duty; and the sense of duty begins to unfold itself in the earliest stages of our being. It speaks of a future world and its inhabitants; and childhood welcomes the idea of angels, of spirits, of the vast, the wonderful, the unseen. Above all, Christianity is set forth in the life, the history, the character of Jesus; and his character, though so sublime, is still so real, so genuine, so remarkable for simplicity, and so naturally unfolded amidst the common scenes of life, that it is seized in its principal features by the child as no other greatness can be.—Channing.

AT the thirty-third annual gathering of the Netherlands Protestantenbond at Dordrecht last October, the Rev. J. van Loenen Martinet was the preacher, as he had been in the previous year at the International Meeting at Amsterdam. His sermon, from the text Hebrews xii. 12, "Lift up the hands that hang down and the palsied knees," was a very earnest appeal to the members of the Protestantenbond for greater energy and more devoted faith in the service of Liberal religion. He alluded to the character of the ruling influence in Holland at the present time, by which piety is unhappily identified with a policy of reaction, as shown in the Government's Universities Bill, of which Professor Eerdmans wrote in THE INQUIRER of November 26. "Christian," the preacher said, "had become a party cry, to the degradation of religion, and it must be to them an urgent call of duty, by every means in their power to strengthen the forces of liberalism, and not only to increase their numbers but to deepen the power of inward religious life in their unions. In the same spirit Professor Oort spoke as chairman of the subsequent public meeting, recognising, indeed, the dangers and difficulties of the Liberal position, but dwelling on its privileges, glorying in their freedom, and the opportunity it afforded of bearing witness to truth, and manifesting the power of personal religion.

The present moment, when there is so much need for watchfulness and for the fearless marshalling of all the forces that make for progress in the field of active service, is opportune for the publication of such a record as that by Dr. Herderscheê, in the first of the books referred to in this notice. It is a sketch of the liberal religious movement in the Netherlands from the middle of last century onwards, with some account of the influences from earlier times, such as that of Schleiermacher in Germany, which prepared the way for that decisive awakening. Dr. Herderscheê's work appears to have been done with laborious and conscientious care, and if it does not take hold of one as a luminous and inspiring presentment of a great subject, it covers a wide field both of intellectual and practical activity, and will be found a useful guide to names and dates, and to the large amount of literature available for the study of the movement. In the story of the rise of the "modern" school, the names of Scholten and Kuenen hold their rightful place of honour. There is an account of the "Vergadering van Moderne Theologen," and of the Protestantenbond with its many forms of service, and the record is brought down to the International Meeting of last year at Amsterdam.

Professor Groenewegen's work is of a different character, but no less timely. It is an essay on the true nature of scientific theology, and its place among other studies, with reference to the present controversy on university teaching. It goes to the root of the matter, and concludes with a strong word on the need for genuine religious life, if there is to be any fruitful study of theology.

The Theologisch Tijdschrift was founded in 1867, a bi-monthly review, to represent the Moderns in the field of scientific theological scholarshp. Kuenen and Tiele were among the first editors, and Oort joined the board in 1879. The names of the present editors are given in the note. This year, for the first time we believe, in the history of the review, an article in English has been published, an address on "The Influence of Quietism on the Society of Friends," by Dr. J. Rendel-Harris, and there are also two book reviews in English, by Dr. Kirsopp Lake, van Manen's successor in the New Testament chair at Leiden. As examples of the articles which have appeared during the present year we may mention the following: "A Philosophical Forsaking of the World" (on Philo's ideal of the contemplative life), by Professor Oort; "The Great Day of Atonement," by Professor Eerdmans; "Women as Students of Theology," by Professor Pijper; "On the Clementines," by Professor Meyboom; "The Theology of Petrus Bloccius," by Professor Knappert; and "Dualistic and Monistic Images in Egyptian Religion," by Professor Kristensen.

Two years ago a second scientific theological review was established by the "Moderns," to be issued not six times a year, but quarterly, and not at Leiden, but at Haarlem. Teyler's Theologisch Tijdschrift it is called, and it is edited by the members of Teyler's Godgeleerd Genootschap (which we take to be a body somewhat similar to the Dr. Williams' or the Hibbert Trustees), with the assistance of Professors both at Utrecht and Amsterdam. Into the reasons which led to the establishment of a second Tijdschrift it is not for us to enter here, and, however much we might wish that all the forces of our friends might be united in producing one strong liberal review, there can be no question that Teyler's Theologisch Tijdschrift is a publication no less admirable and useful to scholars than its older contemporary. Both give a wide survey of the year's theological and kindred literature, and maintain a high standard of excellence. In its first year Teyler's had a cogent article by Professor Cramer, "Noodig Verweer," on the universities controversy, and a valuable series of articles by Professor Bruining of Amsterdam, on Dogmatic Method. In the present year's issue, Professor Bruining has an article on "Pantheism or Theism," and Professor Cannegieter, of Utrecht, contributes to three successive numbers a study of "Religion in Man, and Man in Religion." We may also mention Dr. Elhorst's article on "The Ephod," and Professor Meyboom's on the new issue of Wundt's Ethics.

Whether the dual publication of the Tijdschriften is likely to continue long we cannot say, but we will venture one remark in conclusion. These two reviews appeal only to scholars, but from the present position of liberal religion in Holland it is very clear that the issue of the conflict must rest with the people. Perhaps we write in ignorance of much that is being done, but we cannot help wishing that some of the eminent ability now engaged in the production of these two reviews might be enlisted in a more popular service, whether in pamphlets or a magazine for wide distribution, not only to demonstrate the results of modern scholarship in the study of the Bible and history, and the religions of the world, but to bring home to the people the practical religious bearing of those results, and to touch new springs of inspiration that shall minister to the needs of the present day.

SOME GERMAN BOOKS.

FIRST in this brief notice we place two little books by Professor Pfleiderer, of Berlin: "Das Christusbild des Urchristlichen Glaubens in Religionsgeschichtlicher Beleuchtung." (Berlin: G. Reimer.) "Vorbereitung des Christentums in der Griechischen Philosophie." (Halle: Gebauer-Schwetschke. 40 pf.) The first of these is the address given at the International meeting at Amsterdam in the autumn of 1903, but in much completer form, for at Amsterdam only the introductory pages and the conclusion were read, and are so published in the volume of Proceedings, "Religion and Liberty" (Leiden, 1904). This essay on "The Christ" of Primitive Christian Faith in the light of the history of Religion illustrates in a masterly way how many were the elements added to the personal influence of Jesus himself, which went to form the conception of the Christ, as we find it in the early Christian literature. Jewish prophecy, Rabbinical teaching, Oriental wisdom, and Greek philosophy all had a share in it. Taking successively the elements in that conception of Christ, as Son of God, Conqueror of Satan, Miraculous Saviour, Victor over Death and Life-Giver, and "King of kings and Lord of lords," Professor Pfleiderer shows how remarkable parallels or suggestions of these are found in the earlier religions, not only in the older Jewish literature, but in Egypt, Persia, Babylon, and Greece, and very remarkably in Buddhism, while the modern parallel of the Persian Bab is also cited. At the same time, it is shown how these elements were exalted and spiritualised when taken up into Christian faith, and how they became the vehicle by which ultimate spiritual truths were preserved, and faith in the Christian Spirit, the Spirit of self-sacrifice and perfect love, was delivered from Jewish limitations to become the universal possession of mankind.

A parallel study of great interest is suggested in the other little book, which is the first number of the third series of the "Religionsgeschichtliche Volksbücher," edited by Lic. F. M. Schiele, of Marburg. Here Professor Pfleiderer gives a popular account of the chief Greek philosophers and their teaching, noting, at the outset, how that great movement of thought ran parallel in time with the growth of Hebrew religion from the great age of the prophets onward. The first pages are devoted to Socrates and his forerunners, then the longest section of the beok is devoted to Plato, followed by a notice of Aristotle. The second longest section deals with the Stoics and particularly Seneca, giving a number of examples of his teaching, and, lastly, Philo of Alexandria, and Plotinus the Neo-Platonist, complete the series. Plotinus (205-270 A.D.) set before his followers an exalted, mystical union with God as the great end to be attained; but it was only for the lofty philosopher, separated from his kind, not for the common people. Thus philosophy confessed that it had no true Gospel such as Christianity offered to humble and exalted alike, to all mankind. Greek philosophy was a preparation for Christianity only in so far as it proved the capacity of the mind for truth, and taught men to realise the ideal elements in human life. Professor Pfleiderer's book strikes us as an admirable introduction to a great subject, presented in a lucid and attractive manner.

In connection with the former of these two books, we may mention the valuable study by Professor Gunkel, which is the first number in the series of "Forschungen zur Religion und Literatur des Alten und Neuen Testaments," which he and Professor Bousset, of Göttingen, are editing.

"Zum Religionsgeschichtlichen Verständniss des Neuen Testament." Von Hermann Gunkel. (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht. 1903. M. 2.) This is the essay to which Mr. Carpenter refers in his review of Professor Cheyne's "Bible Problems" this week. An English translation, we are told in the preface, appeared in the Monist for April, 1903. Too little account, Professor Gunkel says, has been hitherto taken of the Oriental elements from other countries which found their way into Jewish thought before the time of Christ, but when recognised and properly interpreted, they throw a flood of light on the New Testament writings, and explain a great deal which is there found in such marked contrast to the Old. A great part of what is mythical in the New Testament and particularly the Apocalyptic imagery, is thus traced to extraneous sources; and the author, in conclusion, adopts the saying of Bousset that "Judaism was the retort into which the various elements were collected," out of which Christianity emerged as a syncretistic religion, but, as the necessary product of the religious spirit of our race, fitted to minister to East and West alike, and to inaugurate a new era in the history of mankind.

The publishers of the "Forschungen," Messrs. Vandenhoeck und Ruprecht, of Göttingen, announce what promises to be a work of great value, a new translation into modern German, with a commentary, of the New Testament, by Professors Baumgarten, Bousset, Gunkel, Jülicher, Joh. Weiss, and others, to be issued in two large volumes (for 10 M.; to subscribers). There will be an introduction to each of the books, and the interpretation will be in the light of the history of religion, taking into consideration the researches referred to in the earlier part of this notice. The work should be of special value to teachers.

Of a different character, but still in the line of progressive religious thought is the first volume of the "Lebens-Fragen" (Life Questions) issued under the editorship of Professor H. Weinel, formerly of Bonn, now of Jena.

"Die Religion unserer Klassiker, Lessing, Herder, Schiller, Goethe," von Karl Sell, Professor der Theologie zu Bonn (Tübingen und Leipzig: J. C. B. Mohr (Paul Siebeck), 1904. M. 2 80. In Messrs. Williams & Norgate's list, 3s., or bound 4s.) It is a most attractive study of the four great writers, based on some popular University lectures, and is warmly to be commended to English readers interested in German literature. The religion of these classics, the author frankly admits, was by no means Christianity in the ordinary sense, but he shows how truly religious each was in his own way. We shall be tempted, if leisure serves, to return to this book for fuller notice.

We have also received, in the same series, a first contribution by the Editor himself:—"Paulus. Der Mensch und sein Werk: Die Anfänge des Christentums, der Kirche und des Dogmas." Von Heinrich Weinel. (M. 3.) Of this we hope to publish a review early in the New Year. Both for this series and for Schiele's "Religionsgeschichtliche Volksbücher," of which we shall soon have more to say, we wish very cordially an abundant success.

At the end of this notice of German books we will pay a long-standing debt of honour to Professor Wendt's two English lectures: this year's Essex Hall Lecture, and the second, given in the same week at Manchester College, Oxford. "The Idea and Reality of Revelation, and Typical Forms of Christianity," by Hans Hinrich Wendt, Ph.D., D.D., Professor of Theology in the University of Jena. (London: Philip Green. 1s. 6d. net.) It was an honour and a great pleasure to welcome Professor Wendt to this country, and his lectures were fully reported in these columns at the time of their delivery. In their published form they will repay careful study. His exposition of the true meaning of Revelation as an element in the inward, spiritual nature of man, and of what he calls the Gospel type of Christianity, if fully grasped, will answer many of the deepest needs of thought and life in the present day.

And, finally, a word of welcome to Messrs. Williams & Norgate's "English Theologian's Model Library of Foreign Theological Literature." (1s. net.) A classified list of many of the best current books in various branches of theological study.

George Henry Russell Garcia: Memoir-Sermons, and Addresses, memoir by the Rev. J. G. Henderson, is a memorial of a young Congregational minister, who, after ten years of service at Sunderland, died in his thirty-fifth year. As a student he went from Cheshunt to St. John's College, Cambridge. The volume will be treasured by many friends who felt the power and the promise of Mr. Garcia's ministry. POPULAR UNIVERSITIES IN FRANCE.

In two previous papers I have tried to suggest the general character of the Adult School movement in England and that of the Danish Peasants' High Schools. The French Popular University has something in common with each of these, but it is of more recent origin, and represents, in some respects, the most interesting movement of all. For, in matters democratic, France is still in the van, and her social experiments have a prophetic quality towards which we cannot afford to be indifferent.

The Danish High Schools arose, as we have seen, out of a well-considered determination to arrest Germanising influences, and develop the national spirit. The French Popular University (known in France as the "U.P.") has also sprung up to oppose a national enemy, but in this case of a more subtle kind. The foe is not here a hostile nation, but an element in the national character which is inimical to social progress. Every U.P. is the frank antagonist of clericalism, that redoubtable enemy of the Republic. And, just as the Prusso-Danish war opened the way for successful High School propaganda, so the Affaire Dreyfus—the crisis in the long struggle between France and the French Clerical party—was the psychological moment for founding Popular Universities.

They seem to be the fruit of that "Union for Moral Action" which was formed eleven years ago among earnest men of all shades of religious opinion. Both the Union and the U.P.'s are socio-ethical in aim and undenominational in character, while many of the most active members of the Union have been founders of, or helpers in, Popular Universities. M. Charles Wagner, for example, one of the first members of the Union, had previously (in 1889) initiated the workman's clubs (cercles ouvriers), which were the forerunners of the U.P.'s; and it was he who, in 1898, gave the inaugural address at the opening of the "Co-operation of Ideas," one of the first and most notable of the typical U.P.'s of Paris. M. Deherme, its director, has also been an active member of the Union.

During the critical years between the court-martial of Alfred Dreyfus in 1894 and the trial at Rennes in 1899 the Union did good service to the cause of freedom. Its members fought heroically against the mad anti-Semitism which threatened for awhile to destroy all the liberties of the Republic. The struggle in which they often stood alone, and were always covered with obloquy, convinced them of the necessity of some practical and permanent alliance with the people. And amongst the most enlightened and serious of the working men the danger and insidiousness of clerical machinations had aroused a keen sense of their need for fellowship and intercourse with the true spiritual leaders of France. Thus the crisis drew the "intellectuals" and the progressive section of the working people together, and the Popular University was the outcome of their union.

The name "Popular University" requires some explanation, for the U.P. is distinct from the movement of University extension as we know it in this country; the root idea is rather that of fellowship than of instruction, and the teaching takes a somewhat different form. The Popular University aims at the higher education of the people by means of the mutual exchange of ideas; and the members choose that form of education which they believe will best enable them to prepare their class for the conception and realisation of the ideal of liberty. Those who best understand the educational needs of working men, whether in England or in France, are coming to recognise that they cannot be met by a diluted or selected University curriculum. The academic lecture or course of lectures is, for them, the wrong method of instruction, while the present-day academic ideal of education itself is perhaps rather calculated to raise the individual out of his class than to help him in raising that class toward a higher ideal of life. It is not that working men require a technical rather than a literary education; they want culture in the best sense of the word. But they are not "undergraduates," they are men with considerable experience of the practical side of life and of citizenship; while the time at their disposal—their Sundays and evenings—is, properly speaking, their time for recreation. The success of the U.P.'s has largely depended upon a thorough understanding of these two facts, an understanding which has made the U.P. a rendezvous for the most serious and thoughtful working men and women who desire to discuss in a friendly and informal way those living questions of art and of ethics which are of eternal interest to us all, and to share together in the more ennobling kinds of recreation.

On the other hand, the U.P.'s are not "settlements." One of the older among them, the Fondation Universitaire of Belleville (Paris), is copied from Toynbee Hall, but it is exceptional, and fills a special place.

The character of a typical U.P. is perhaps best seen in the "Co-operation of Ideas," previously referred to. This grew by interesting stages out of the meetings of a small group of advanced working men held weekly for the discussion of philosophy, sociology, and art. They shared together what knowledge and books they possessed. For awhile these meetings lapsed, and the members were only held together by an occasional leaflet, which grew into a little monthly magazine. This aroused the interest of several "intellectuals," and in February, 1898, with their help, a centre of ethico-social education was established in the east of Paris, at Montreuil, followed in April by the creation of another. This latter, in the adjacent district of Saint Antoine, was the "Co-operation of Ideas." Here, in the Rue Paul Bert, a discussion took place every night for more than a year, from eight to ten o'clock, around a table covered with papers, and dimly lighted by oil lamps. The programme of the first week included the following typical subjects introduced by some of the ablest men in Paris:—Literature and Politics in France since 1789; Insanity: Its Frequency, Forms and Causes; The Trade Union Movement in France; Fishers in Newfoundland; The History of Civilisation; The Idea of Law. As the members talked and listened they were confronted by mottoes upon the walls: "In society there is only one living force—man," "We accept the boldest Utopias, preparing to live them out," &c. The space at their disposal soon proving insufficient, it was decided to establish a U.P. more adequate to the needs of its members. Larger premises were acquired, and the membership in October, 1899, had risen to 2,200. Every evening there was an informal lecture, while lessons were given in several courses of training. On Sundays large audiences applauded the musical and other artistic entertainments prepared for them. Medical advice was offered to members, summer walks and excursions were arranged, clubs and co-operative societies were formed, and last year a château was taken on the Bois de Boulogne for the use of the U.P. and its members.

The present premises of the U.P. (157, Faubourg St. Antoine) consist of a large entrance hall, the secretary's office, dark room, and a little shop of the co-operative society, a class-room, used also for the meetings of societies and on Sundays as a co-operative temperance café, and long corridor decorated with casts from the Parthenon frieze, a library containing 3,000 books (and very little fiction) and all the principal magazines, the little art gallery and museum, and the large hall with a seating capacity of four to five hundred.

The monthly subscription is fixed at 50 centimes, and last year there were on the average about a thousand paying members. The whole institution had an air of almost Utopian freedom when I visited it last autumn. Tireless goodwill seemed to have crowded out the forms of representative government. But recent events* seem to show that even for the U.P. a certain measure of "red tape" may still be necessary.

So much by way of description of one of the most interesting of the Paris U.P.'s. The position in the country districts is, of course, widely different; but the essential spirit of aspiration and fellowship is the same. In Deux-Sévres (Poitou), for example, a Poitevine Popular University has been founded to supply speakers to the village U.P.'s, and to assist them with books and advice. This is undoubtedly a most important development, and if pursued, as it appears to be, in the right spirit with the desire to avoid any infringement upon local liberty and initiative, it cannot but strengthen the work in rural districts such as this.

The only statistics of the movement which I have been able to obtain relate to 1902, when there were more than one hundred U.P.'s in different parts of France, forty-three being dotted over Paris and its suburbs. The provincial U.P.'s are very widely scattered, from Rennes and Brest in the north-west, to the foot of the Pyrenees, the shores of the Mediterranean and the marches of Flanders. Twelve of the Paris Universities, not including the large "Co-operation of Ideas," averaged more than two hundred members apiece, while thirty in the provinces had an even higher membership. These appear to be typical of the rest, and it would probably be within the mark to estimate the membership throughout France in 1902 as about thirty thousand.

When I spoke of the U.P. as a centre for the anti-clerical spirit, I was not using the term as a party word, but in a broad and general sense. The Popular University is far from being partisan or anti-Catholic, at least in ideal; but while it recognises that tolerance is the flower of culture, and assiduously cherishes that flower, it often finds itself debarred from the help of priests. Indeed, he must be a truly Catholic priest who can share in so liberal and so profoundly human a fellowship as the U.P. affords. Unfortunately, the clerical party has done all in its power to identify the U.P.'s with Protestantism, Infidelity, and Socialism, in order to keep away all good Catholics. Properly speaking, the U.P. is not a religious organisation at all; it aims at an ethical education, which is in truth the basis of all religion and the monopoly of none. But much of the truest religious teaching in France to-day is being shared together in the U.P.'s. The Bible is practically closed for a great proportion of the intelligent working men of France; they are thoroughly tired of the quarrelling and creed-mongering of which it has been the centre. But the ethical spirit is not dead in France, and it is most instructive to witness the growth of a great ethical movement which has its roots entirely in the needs and aspirations of the present day, whose affirmations, to use the fine phrase of M. Séailles, are those of the Modern Conscience.

One of the most interesting incidents in the recent Peace Congress at Nimes was the address given by the representative of the U.P.'s. He dealt with peace as a result of higher social organisation: but, interesting and able s was his argument, the fact that he stood there as a delegate of the youngest, most hopeful, and most democratic of all the ethico-social movements in France, was of even profounder significance.

For it is only to the work and influence of such a movement as that of the U.P., and the spiritual and economic changes which will inevitably follow it, that we can look for the ultimate realisation of the Kingdom of Peace in the sphere of the civil, religious, or international life.

NOTE.—Since writing the above I have learnt that the crisis which occurred last spring in the affairs of the "Co-operation of Ideas" has resulted, after a painful schism and proceedings in the Courts, in the reconstitution of the society at a new address, 234, Faubourg St. Antone. Here its doors were re-opened on October 3 by M. Deherme, in whose absence abroad the unhappy causes of dissension sprang up. M. Deherme's many friends wish him all success in his faithful service of the cause of Adult Education.

An important conference of the representatives of some seventy U.P.'s was held in Paris last Whitsuntide. (See Cahiers de la Quizaine, September, 1904.)

THE ASTRONOMY OF THE BIBLE.

IT seems obvious that the writers of the Bible held the views with regard to astronomy which were universally current up to the period of that great revolution in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries which is associated mainly with the name of Copernicus.

According to these views it was believed that the earth was a flat plain, bounded by an illimitable ocean; that it was overarched by a solid dome or firmament—the sky—in which the stars were fixed; that the earth was stationary, and that the sun moved round it.

The "firmament," or sky, was conceived of as "stretched out like a curtain," "spread out like a tent" (Ps. civ. 2; Isa. xl. 22). But it must also have been supposed to be made of more substantial material, for it was the floor of the vast reservoir which contained the chief part of the water that fell upon the earth. It "divided the waters which were under the firmament from the waters that were above the firmament" (Gen. i. 6, 7). In this firmament there were "windows" or "doors," which opened to let the rain fall through (Gen. vii. 11; Ps. lxxviii. 23; 2 Kings vii. 19), and when a drought occurred it was because the windows were "shut up" (Deut. xi. 17; 1 Kings viii. 35; Gen. viii. 2). It was supported by "pillars" (Job xxvi. 11).

The firmament was also called "heaven" or "the heavens" (Gen. i. 8). These last words were applied not only to the firmament itself, but to the region both above and below it. The region above the sky was the abode of the Deity. "Hear thou from heaven thy dwelling place" (2 Chron. vi. 30). "The heaven is my throne, and the earth is my footstool" (Isa. lxvi. 1). To Ezekiel, "the heavens were opened," and he "saw visions of God" (Ezek. i. 1). Jesus, after his baptism, "saw the heavens rent asunder, and the Spirit as a dove descending upon him," and "a voice from heaven" spake (Mark i. 10, 11, R.V.). Stephen, at his martyrdom, saw "the heavens open, and the Son of Man standing on the right hand of God" (Acts vii. 56). Peter, in a trance, "saw heaven opened" and a vessel let down to the earth (Acts x. 11). Isaiah prays, "Oh that thou wouldest rend the heavens, that thou wouldest come down" (Isa. lxiv. 1) and the Psalmist pleads: "Bow thy heavens, O Lord, and come down" (Ps. cxliv. 5).

And yet, though the Deity is, in thought, usually located "in heaven," his "omnipresence" was distinctly held by writers of the Bible. In Solomon's prayer at the dedication of the temple we have not only God's "dwelling place" referred to but also the words "behold, the heaven and heaven of heavens cannot contain thee" (1 Kings viii. 27). In Isa. lvii. 15, "the high and lofty One" says, "I dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit." Again, "do not I fill heaven and earth? saith the Lord" (Jer. xxiii. 24). We may also refer to the fine passage in Ps. cxxxix. 7, 8, "Whither shall I go from thy spirit? or whither shall I flee from thy presence? If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there; if I make my bed in hell, behold, thou art there."

But not only was the word "heaven" or "firmament" applied to the sky itself and to the region on the other side; it was also applied to the space on this side—our atmosphere. The birds are created to "fly above the earth in the open firmament of heaven" (Gen. i. 20). This region is frequented not only by his winged creatures, but by the Deity himself. "Who maketh the clouds his chariot; who walketh upon the wings of the wind" (Ps. civ. 3).

The height or distance of the sky supplies some beautiful similes. "As the heaven is high above the earth, so great is his mercy toward them that fear him" (Ps. ciii. 11). "Thy mercy is great above the heavens; and thy truth reacheth unto the clouds" (Ps. cviii. 4). "As the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways, and my thoughts than your thoughts" (Isa. lv. 9). "Though thou set thy nest among the stars, thence will I bring thee down, saith the Lord" (Obad. i. 4).

It is obvious, too (in spite of the desperate efforts of theological "compromisers" to prove the contrary) that, in strange contrast to the inconceivable periods of time that modern science shows must have elapsed since the universe, as we know it, first came into being, the idea generally prevailed that the universe was created out of nothing, in the space of six days, by the fiat of the Almighty (Gen. i; Ps. xxxiii. 9). The divine Artificer "laid the corner stone thereof"; "stretched the line upon it"; "laid the foundations" of it (Job xxxviii. 4—6), and, when it was finished pronounced, with satisfaction, that "it was very good" (Gen. i. 31); and in joyful chorus "the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy" (Job xxviii. 7).

The writers of the Bible probably shared the belief general in ancient times that the world was flat, surrounded by the ocean. True, there are passages which seem to indicate that the idea of the rotundity of the earth may have dawned upon them. In Isa. xl. 22 we have, "It is he that sitteth upon the circle of the earth." Again, in the Prayer-book version in Ps. xciii. 2 we have, "He hath made the round world so sure that it cannot be moved." But the crucial word "round" does not occur either in the Authorised or the Revised Version. On the other hand, in Rev. vii. 1 four angels are seen "standing on the four corners of the earth." This is not consistent with the idea of a sphere.

Upholders of the doctrine of a special "inspiration" for the Bible have made great stock of a text in Job. "He stretcheth out the north over empty space, and hangeth the earth upon nothing (Job xxvi. 7). But if the writer of these words might for a moment seem to have anticipated modern knowledge, we must note that the same author also speaks of the "pillars of the earth trembling" (Job ix. 6). Also we read in 1 Sam. ii. 8, "The pillars of the earth are the Lord's, and he hath set the world upon them."

But though the thoughts of the ancients as regards astronomy were limited and somewhat mechanical, no doubt feelings of great wonder and awe were excited when they turned their gaze on "this brave o'erhanging firmament, this majestical roof, fretted with golden fire." The Psalmist exclaims, "When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which thou hast ordained; what is man, that thou art mindful of him, and the son of man, that thou visitest him?" (Ps. viii. 3, 4). With what vastly added force of feeling can we repeat these words, in the light of the marvellous revelations of modern science, and the inconceivable distances now known to exist in space!

There occurred in connection with the Ptolemaic system of astronomy the beautiful conception of the nine crystal spheres which as they rolled made a music that mortal ears could not hear—"the music of the spheres." This idea no doubt inspired those beautiful lines in the "Merchant of Venice."

> Look, how the floor of heaven
> Is thick inlaid with patines of bright gold;
> There's not the smallest orb which thou
> behold'st,
> But in his motion like an angel sings,
> Still quiring to the young-ey'd cherubins;
> Such harmony is in immortal souls;
> But, whilst this muddy vesture of decay
> Doth grossly close it in, we cannot hear it.

Can we not see a reference to the same idea in Psalm xix., &c. (R.V.). "The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament sheweth his handywork. Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night sheweth knowledge. There is no speech nor language; their voice cannot be heard." We mortals cannot catch the sounds, but we know what the anthem is, "Praise him, sun and moon, praise him all ye stars of light" (Ps. cxlviii. 3).

The Sun, as we should naturally expect, is the subject of many references in the Bible. In Deut. iv. 19 the worship of the sun, moon, and stars is referred to, and forbidden. The sun emerges joyfully from the east "as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber," "a strong man running a race," and so he circuits the heaven from one end to the other (Ps. xix. 5, 6). On two occasions his triumphal course is stayed by a power stronger than his own. Once, at the command of Joshua, to enable the Israelites to complete a decisive battle (Josh. x. 12); and again, as a sign, to confirm the faith of Hezekiah in his promised recovery; "The Lord brought the shadow ten degrees backward, by which it had gone down on the dial of Ahaz" (2 Kings xx. 11).

The sun is often used metaphorically: "The Lord God is a sun and shield" (Ps. lxxxiv. 11). "His countenance was as the sun shineth in his strength" (Rev. i. 16). "Let them that love him be as the sun when he goeth forth in his might" (Judges v. 31). "Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun" (Matt. xiii. 43). Wisdom "is more beautiful than the sun, and above all the order of stars, being compared with the light, she is found before it" (Wisdom vii. 29). In the following passages the rising sun is used as a metaphor. "Unto you that fear my name shall the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings" (Mal. iv. 2). "Whereby the day-spring from on high hath visited us" (Luke i. 78). "Until the day dawn, and the day star arise in your hearts" (2 Peter i. 19). "The path of the just is as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day" (Prov. iv. 18). The sun is used as a type of stability, endurance. "They shall fear thee as long as the sun and moon endure, throughout all generations" (Ps. lxxii. 5). Trouble and disaster are typified by the sun's premature decline. "Her sun is gone down while it was yet day" (Jer. xv. 9). "I will cause the sun to go down at noon, I will darken the earth in the clear day" (Amos viii. 9).

And a time will come when these lights will no longer be needed. "The city had no need of the sun, neither of the moon, to shine in it; for the glory of God did lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof" (Rev. xxi. 1, 23).

The beneficent effects of the sun are for the most part referred to, but other effects are not forgotten. "The sun shall not smite thee by day, nor the moon by night" (Ps. cxxi. 6). "Neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat" (Rev. vii. 16). "I am black, because the sun hath looked upon me" (or "scorched me") (Cant. i. 6). Ordinary mortals when they gaze upon the sun can see only "spots" on its face, but to John in Patmos it was given to see "an angel standing in the sun" (Rev. xix. 17). He also saw "a great wonder in heaven; a woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve stars" (Rev. xii. 1).

The stars were conceived to be innumerable "lesser lights," affixed to the solid firmament (Gen. i. 16, 17). The men who wrote the Bible were the leaders of thought, the leaders of science, of their day. What a strange contrast is there between their thoughts about the stars and ours. We know that probably every one of the millions of stars are suns, in the ranks of which our sun takes a quite subordinate place; and our sun is more than a million times larger than the earth. In the light of this knowledge it is interesting to read the following:—"And the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind" (Rev. vi. 13). In Rev. xii. 4 we read that the tail of the great dragon "drew the third part of the stars of heaven, and did cast them to the earth." And in Dan. viii. 10, "the little horn" "waxed great, even to the host of heaven; and it cast down some of the host and of the stars to the ground, and stamped upon them."

The number of the stars is also used as a simile: Unto Abraham the Lord said; "I will multiply thy seed as the stars o the heaven" (Gen. xxii. 17); and although to the eye of man "the host of heaven cannot be numbered" (Jer. xxxiii. 22), there is one who "telleth the number of the stars, and calleth them all by their names" (Ps. cxlvii. 4). And when a symbol was needed for the looked-for Deliverer of Israel, no better could be found than a star. "There shall come a Star out of Jacob" (Num. xxiv. 17). "I am the root and offspring of David, and the bright and morning star" (Rev. xxii.16). The above passage in Num. xxiv. 17 is probably the source from which sprang the myth of the "Star of Bethlehem" (Matt. ii. 2). Much research and ingenuity have been expended in efforts to prove that some remarkable planetary conjunction occurred at the period in question. But it may well be deemed an idle quest; a moment's thought will show the impossibility of men being guided to a particular spot by a star moving along the heavens.

Another metaphor: "They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever" (Dan. xii. 3).

The same metaphor is used in an opposite sense, and instead of "bright and morning stars" we have "wandering stars, to whom is reserved the blackness of darkness for ever" (Jude 13).

This text is curious in view of some of the latest teachings of modern astronomy. Many authorities hold the opinion that space abounds with "dark stars" which were once glowing suns, but whose light has now gone out, quenched with age. No words could more graphically describe these than the text just quoted from Jude. But it is, of course, only a coincidence.

Individual stars are referred to by name in the following texts, but whether they are identical with the stars which now bear these names it is impossible to say. "Which maketh Arcturus (or "the Bear," R.V.), Orion, and Pleiades" (Job ix. 9). "Canst thou bind the sweet influences (or "the cluster," R.V.) of the Pleiades, or loose the bands of Orion? Canst thou bring forth Mazzaroth (or "the signs of the Zodiac") in his season, or canst thou guide Arcturus (or "the Bear" R.V.) with his sons?" "Seek him that maketh the seven stars (or "the Pleiades," R.V.) and Orion" (Amos v. 8).

We have again the opposite metaphors of permanence and transiency used with regard to the universe. "Who laid the foundations of the earth, that it should not be removed for ever" (Ps. civ. 5). "The earth abideth for ever" (Eccles. i. 4). And yet we read of the earth and the heavens "shaking" and "being moved" (2 Sam. xxii. 8); of the earth being shaken out of her place and the pillars thereof trembling (Job ix. 6). Nay, worse than this; for there shall come a day when "the sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood" (Joel ii. 31; Rev. vi. 12); when "the sun and moon shall be darkened, and the stars shall withdraw their shining" (Joel iii. 15); when "the moon shall be confounded and the sun ashamed" (Isa. xxiv. 23). Again, the heavens and the earth "shall perish"; "they all shall wax old as doth a garment; and as a vesture shalt thou fold them up, and they shall be changed" (Heb. i. 11, 12); the heavens are seen to depart "as a scroll when it is rolled together" (Rev. vi. 14). Finally, it is foretold that "the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements (or "heavenly bodies," R.V.) shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up" (2 Peter iii. 10). And yet this is not the last word, for we read in Rev. xxi. 1, 5, "I saw a new heaven and a new earth." "Behold, I make all things new."

Again we note an interesting coincidence between some of the texts just quoted and modern cosmical theories connected with the "nebular hypothesis." It is a generally held "hypothesis" (not a proved fact) of modern astronomy that stars may meet their doom by something in the nature of a terrific collision or explosion, the results of which some of the above texts would aptly describe. The effect of such a stellar catastrophe would reduce the body or bodies involved to nebulous vapour, and from this, in course of time, by process of cooling and contraction, new stars and worlds would come into being.

SUGAR.

SIR,—I have no wish to enter into a discussion upon a commercial matter in the columns of THE INQUIRER, but your reference to me in your article "A Timely Object Lesson" last week, compels me to take some notice of it.

First, let me say that I have nothing to withdraw or explain away in my previous letter to which you refer. Notwithstanding the present rise in the price of sugar, I have no fear that the average price of the future will exceed that of the average of the past ten years.

At present, approximately, two-thirds of the world's sugar production consists of European beet sugar which, owing to exceptionally unfavourable weather, was this year over 1,000,000 tons (or 20 per cent.) short of a normal crop, thus accounting for the present rise in price.

Had the Convention not come into operation, the sugar industry in such unsubsidised countries as Java, Brazil, and the West Indies would, by this time, have been practically killed out, resulting in a further very large decrease of production, and what the price of sugar would, under such circumstances, have been, it is impossible to estimate.

So far, therefore, the Convention has undoubtedly been the means of saving an enormous sum to the consumers of sugar.

Of recent years the confectionery trade of this country has been a "protected" industry in being able to obtain its raw material at an unnaturally depressed price, considerably below the cost of its production owing to Continental bounties and cartels, which Mr. Gladstone, whose authority I hope you will recognise, characterised as "unfair and entirely inconsistent with Free Trade." Now, for the first time for about thirty years, there is practically Free Trade in sugar, which is only obtainable at its natural price, regulated by the ordinary laws of supply and demand.

The reference to the exclusion from this country of sugars from Russia and the Argentine, of which so much has been said, does not affect the argument in the least, as the sugars produced in those countries have to go into the world's consumption somewhere and thus release others for this market.

I may further add that on many occasions whilst bounties were in full force, the price of sugar has been higher than it is now, and the cause of such high prices was always a deficient supply. Under the Convention these violent fluctuations of price are not so likely to recur, and the competition between the various producing countries will ensure a large supply at a low price.

MR. P. C. MOZOOMDAR.

SIR,—The last few mails from India have brought the sad news that the Rev. P. C. Mozoomdar, of the Brahmo Somaj of India, is dangerously ill, and has had to undergo an operation. The medical attendants declare the complications serious, and it is suggested that careful and skilful nursing and after-treatment are necessary to prolong life. The Mission Fund in Calcutta has issued an appeal in India for help. May I have your permission to extend that appeal through your columns to many friends of Mr. Mozoomdar in this country?

Mr. Ion Pritchard, whose active interest in the Brahmo Somaj is so well known, has very kindly consented to receive and acknowledge donations. Will friends kindly forward their remittances to him as treasurer, "Mozoomdar Fund," Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.?

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

APPEALS.

London: Bell-street Mission.—The Rev. Sydney H. Street, 4, Avenue-villas, Cricklewood-lane, N.W., writes:—"I shall be grateful if you will allow me once again to make an appeal through your columns on behalf of our Bell-street Domestic Mission Poor's Purse. There is more than usual need for such help this year. I am afraid that Christmas will prove a very hard time for many of our poorer neighbours. May I also once again appeal for personal help in our work? Workers are needed in many departments, but especially are we short of teachers in our Sunday-school. Will not some of your readers come to our help with the New Year?"

London: Bermondsey. — Rev. Eustace Thompson, 47, Upper Grange-road, Bermondsey, writes:—"Two years ago an appeal in our papers for contributions towards the scholars' annual party and prizes met with a very generous response. We say nothing about one year ago, except that one cheerful giver forestalled our appeal by a cheque for £2, and we hope that on this occasion quite a number of kind people will come and do likewise, or as much like it as they can."

Blackpool: Bank-street.—A bazaar was held last week to raise the sum of £250 towards the £1,000 which the congregation is endeavouring to raise. The opening ceremony was performed on the first day by Councillor W. Healey, of Heywood, (in the unavoidable absence of Mr. R. D. Holt, of Liverpool). Mr. Healey made an interesting speech on Unitarianism, and at the conclusion very generously contributed £10 to the fund. On the second day the bazaar was opened by Sir J. T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., who spoke encouraging words to the workers, and said he should have pleasure in contributing £50 to the fund. Alderman Thos. Holt, J.P., of Bury, who was the opener on the third day, expressed the belief that the future of their church was more promising than ever it had been before. Upon declaring the bazaar open, he handed a cheque for £10 to the treasurer. Generous help was also received from the respective chairmen, Messrs. W. Ross, Alderman James Fish, and H. Helm. A pleasing feature at the close of the bazaar was the presentation of an enamelled hand-painted five o'clock tea table, also a picture with beautifully embossed mount, to Mrs. McGee, in appreciation of her work in connection with the bazaar. The total proceeds amounted to £245.

Bolton: Bank-street.—The interest in the course of religious instruction lectures by the Rev. J. H. Weatherall continued to the end, and a crowded audience again assembled in the Spinners' Hall on Tuesday night, when the closing lecture was given on the subject "Personal Righteousness." This course was originally designed for candidates for the membership of Bank-street Chapel, but the experiment of throwing it open to the public has been very successful, about a third of each audience consisting of people not connected with any of our local churches.

Boston.—A lecture was given in Spain-lane Chapel on Thursday, December 8, by the Rev. John Page Hopps, on "A Scientific Basis of Belief in a Future Life." There was a very good attendance, and the lecture was highly appreciated. Part of the expense of the lecture was defrayed by the B. and F. U. Association.

Dudley.—The Rev. Charles Peach, of Manchester, preached at the Old Meeting House on Sunday, as representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. On Monday evening Mr. Peach held the close attention of a highly appreciative audience with his lecture on "The Moral System of Shakespeare." Mr. J. P. Tilley presided, and Messrs. E. J. Thompson, W. Timmins, J. Eld, and T. W. Green congratulated and thanked the lecturer.

Huddersfield (Jubilee).—In celebration of the jubilee of Fitzwilliam-street church, which was opened on December 21, 1854, by the Rev. James Martineau, a series of meetings and services have just been concluded. Five lectures on "The Theological and Religious Changes of Fifty Years, 1854-1904," including lectures on "Changed Christian Standpoints," "Changes in Sectional Terms—Trinitarian and Unitarian," "The New Doctrine of the Incarnation," "Movements Towards a Larger Christian Union," and "Lessons and Anticipations," were given by the minister, the Rev. W. Mellor, on successive Sunday evenings from November 6 to December 4 inclusive. He also gave "A History of the Formation and Early Days of Our Huddersfield Church," in connection with the meeting of the Church and School Guild, on Wednesday, November 30. On Sunday last the services were conducted by the Rev. Frank Walters, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, when good congregations assembled, and Mr. Walters preached able and inspiring sermons, which, together with the usual excellent music, made the day a pleasant and helpful one. On Monday evening the Jubilee Anniversary Tea Meeting was held, at which there was a good representative gathering. At the after-meeting, which was opened by a hymn, the Rev. W. Mellor took the chair, and, in addition to the chairman's speech, addresses were given by the Revs. Frank Walters, and J. H. Green. Alderman Balmforth proposed and Mr. S. C. Potts, the Borough Treasurer, seconded a resolution of thanks to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association for its valuable help in these Jubilee Services, and to Mr. Walters for his highly-appreciated services to the common cause, which was most cordially carried. Excellent selections of music were given by the choir. After a resolution of thanks to all who had helped to render the meeting successful, the proceedings were closed by singing the well-known hymn "O God, our help in ages past," and by the Benediction.

Leicester: Narborough Road.—A Sale of Work, promoted by the Ladies' Sewing Society, to assist the current expenses of the church, was held in the schoolroom on December 7th and 8th. The sale was opened on the respective dates by Mrs. Samuel Faire, and the Mayor (Councillor S. Hilton). The net proceeds amounted to £98, being a better result than was anticipated. A stall was generously provided by the members of the Men's Adult School Union, holding its meetings in the schoolroom, but in no way connected with the church.

London: Highgate.—On Saturday evening, December 3, the Rev. L. Taverner gave a lantern lecture on the life and work of the late G. F. Watts, R.A., to the Unitarian Temperance Society. The lecture, which was based upon intimate personal knowledge of this great artist was warmly appreciated. On the previous evening the "Plain Talk" in the Free Library was given by Mr. R. Tawney, of Toynbee Hall, on "Co-operation."

London Sunday School Society.—The annual social meeting of teachers and elder scholars was held at Essex Hall last Saturday, but was not quite so well attended as usual. After an hour for tea and sociability the chair was taken by Miss Marian Pritchard, in the absence of the President, Mr. John Harrison, who wrote to say how greatly he regretted that the state of his health forbade his coming out to an evening meeting. Miss Pritchard, in an opening address of welcome, spoke of the pleasure and value of such a gathering, and referred to the great interest of the Nature Lectures which are being given to the teachers in several of the London schools by the Rev. Thomas Robinson. A great part of the evening's programme was provided by the Limehouse Band and Choir, who gave great pleasure both by their playing and singing. The distraction of the bells of St. Clement's was specially trying during the recitations which Miss E. J. Troup kindly gave and the violin solos of Mr. W. T. Waddington. Mr. Savage Cooper also contributed a song. The entertainment closed in good time with the singing of "God Save the King." Miss Pritchard announced that Mr. Waddington's cantata, "Princess Zara," with orchestral accompaniment, was to be given at the Mansford-street School on Wednesday, Jan. 18, in aid of the Southend Home. Tickets, 1s. and 6d.

Mottram.—The Chapel Anniversary sermons were preached on Sunday, November 7, by the Rev. R. T. Herford, of Stand. The attendances were smaller than usual for such an occasion, owing largely to the extreme wintery weather. The congregation has suffered serious losses of membership recently by death and removal. In the death of Mrs. Williamson at the end of November, a very faithful and devoted member passed away; and in the removal of Mr. J. H. Elkin, senior superintendent of the Sunday-school, a serious gap is left in the workers' ranks. At a farewell party on Monday, December 5, an address was presented to Mr. Elkin, together with a dressing-case, leather pocket wallet, silver-mounted umbrella, and a copy of the Sunday-school Hymn-book, in superior binding. The address was inscribed in an autograph album with space for the signatures of friends. Mr. Elkin set sail for Mexico on Wednesday, December 7, to take up an important business appointment.

Reading.—The annual sale of work took place on the 7th inst., and was opened by Miss Ridge. There was a good attendance, and the sum realised was very satisfactory.

"THE NEW AGE"

A Weekly Review of Politics, Religion, and Literature.

"The paper has made for some years past, and continues to make, a strong effort to touch our politics with religion. Its standpoint is that of a broad and Liberal unsectarian Christianity, and its great aim is to be helpful and suggestive to all who seek to enlarge and ennoble the national life."

"The New Age" is thus commended by R. A. ARMSTRONG, B.A.; JOHN BURNS, M.P.; JOHN CLIFFORD, D.D.; CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A.; SILAS K. HOCKING; G. W. KITCHIN, Dean of Durham; J. BRYN ROBERTS, M.P.; PHILIP H. WICKSTEED, M.A.; HENRY J. WILSON, M.P.

"WILL WARBURTON," GEO. GISSING'S LAST WORK, will appear as a Serial, beginning with the New Year.

All Liberal Thinkers and Social Reformers should support "THE NEW AGE."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

ALL GOOD CHRISTMAS WISHES to friends near and distant! "In the work of creating a condition of peace and goodwill among men," says Dr. Crothers in the December Atlantic Monthly, "the Christian nations have not gone very far." But we ought not to spend this time "crying over the spilt milk of human kindness."

To enter heartily into the spirit of Christmas one must not take its message as a declaration of an accomplished fact, but as a prophecy. Now it is nothing against a prophecy that it has not yet been fulfilled. The further off it is the more credit to the eyes that see and to the stout hearts that patiently wait and work for it. The practical question is not "Has it come?" but "Is it on the way?" Christmas is the time for the consideration of a bit of the unfinished business of the world.

The children's happiness and the joy of all true friendship should help us to consider it with a new steadfastness and courage, and with the earnest prayer that wisdom and strength may be given to every faithful effort for the common good.

THE Rev. Charles Hargrove and Mrs. Hargrove landed at Liverpool last Saturday evening, and were just in time to get the last train home to Leeds. Mr. Hargrove preached on Sunday morning to a crowded congregation in Mill Hill Chapel, taking for his text, "O God, Thou art my God." It was just thirty-six weeks, he said, since he had last addressed the Mill Hill congregation. The time did not seem long to those who had lived many years, but it had been to him like a whole lifetime. So much had he seen, new men, new cities, new scenes had he passed amongst, that the impressions crowded upon his mind in confusion. Nor, indeed, had he come prepared with a formal discourse—for he had only reached home at midnight, and his head still rang with eight days' rolling to and fro on the sea, where it was difficult to think and impossible to write. He had just a few simple words which came from his heart to those who had been ever present in his mind all the time he had been so far away from them—as far as it was possible to be in life. But he had been their minister all the time, and so he spoke, not as he would to any other congregation, telling them of his experiences abroad, but as to his own family to whom he came back after a long parting.

WHEN he left home, Mr. Hargrove said, it was with a certain heaviness of heart. He felt no confidence in his own ability to perform the mission on which he had been sent, so that he should feel the best had been done that could be done, and as the train went out of the station he felt a heavy depression. And then it was as if an inspiration came to him, just in the words he had chosen for his text. "O God, Thou art my God." And he leant upon the words as a weary man would lean upon a staff, and they brought him comfort and strength, and upheld him, and they had been with him ever since. Those words contained all religion, all philosophy, all theology, all that he had to teach. They were his creed, and if the words were a delusion and a folly, then his life was a stupid blunder, and he was lost indeed. But if the words were true—and he did not question, did not reason about them—then he might fail to do what he ought to do, but there was the infinite force behind.

MR. HARGROVE has promised us two more letters on his journey, one telling of the close of his mission in New Zealand, the other of his journey across the United States. These we hope to publish in the first two numbers of the New Year. Friends throughout the country will join with us in heartily congratulating Mr. and Mrs. Hargrove, and the Mill Hill congregation, on their safe return.

MR. FRANK PRESTON wrote last week in comment on our leading article on the Sugar Convention. His chief point was that unfavourable weather had reduced the normal beet sugar crop in Europe by over 1,000,000 tons, and that this was the cause of the present high price. It is no part of the Free Traders' case to deny that natural fluctuations in supply have their effect on prices. They merely point out that artificial restrictions on supply have their effect also. When the imposition of such artificial restrictions coincides with a natural shortage, the ill effects are of course doubly disastrous. In the present case we have to add to the 1,000,000 tons natural shortage—assuming that it is all natural—the further shortage created (1) by the withdrawal of their bounties on exports by the Signatories of the Convention, and (2) by the prohibition of the importation of the sugar of those countries continuing their bounties.

IT is poor consolation to us, even if it were wholly true, that the cheap prohibited sugar finds its way into other countries, and so "releases" other but dearer sugar for our own market. One of the most vexatious effects of the Convention, as we pointed out a fortnight ago, is this very diversion of cheap sugar into countries which are using the advantage it gives them in order to drive our confectioners out of markets abroad in which they have hitherto been supreme. As a matter of fact, the several provisions of the Convention have so stimulated consumption abroad that the sugar diverted thither is very far indeed from "releasing" a corresponding amount for home consumption. The bounties were, of course, injurious to the West Indies and other "unsubsidised countries." Equally of course they were, as Mr. Gladstone said, "unfair and entirely inconsistent with Free Trade." That was their misfortuue, but it was not our fault. The fiscal policy of foreign countries is their concern and not ours; and it is not our business to compel them to alter it; whether by "retaliation" against protective duties or by legislation against bounties.

IT is essential that one should grasp this distinction between what is our affair and what is our neighbours': It is our concern to see that we do nothing by our legislation to prevent our getting our imports as cheap as our neighbours will let us have them. That, for us, is the essential principle of Free Trade, and it is that principle which we have broken by our part in the Sugar Convention. If our neighbours had abolished their bounties of their own accord we must, as Free Traders, have acquiesced with a good grace, but it is preposterous to say that while we prohibit the importation of sugars of which we stand in need—or even that while we are preventing bounties by the threat of prohibition—we have "practically Free Trade in sugar," or that a market so restricted is "regulated by the ordinary laws of supply and demand." To use such phrases to describe such a situation is a rather surprising misuse of terms.

MR. PRESTON says that but for the Convention the sugar production of Java, Brazil, and the West Indies would have been lost to us; but that production is not comparable for a moment with the production of the countries excluded by the Convention. Moreover, it is certain that directly existing supplies proved permanently inadequate to the world's needs, fresh sources of supply, bounties or no bounties, would have sprung into existence. Production may be slightly increased in the West Indies by the Convention, but not to the required extent. Protection always has been, and always will be, a losing game. Let Mr. Preston justify if he can, on Free Trade principles, the prohibition of the import of useful merchandise for the avowed purpose of securing the Protection of competing British growers.

WE shall not, we think, be wronging Mr. Preston if we interpret his disclaimer of a wish "to enter into a discussion upon a commercial matter in the columns of THE INQUIRER" as intended to convey the opinion that the Sugar Convention is not a fit topic for discussion in our columns. To that we can only reply that THE INQUIRER has always held, and will always hold, that legislation which it believes to be calculated to increase the cost of the necessities of life, and therefore to increase the preventable hardships of the poor, is a proper matter for discussion and condemnation in its columns. Its concern is not only with the theory, but with the practice of Christian ethics, and the issue between Protection and Free Trade—between the artificial enhancement of the price of food and the preservation of cheap supplies—it holds to be an issue in which Christian ethics are fundamentally concerned.

IN our notes last week on the Cheshunt College entanglement, we refrained from stating that the members of the college did not believe and abhor in the terms of their subscription, and we refrained simply because it seemed unnecessary for us as outsiders in the controversy to pursue the question. We are glad, however, to find in the Examiner, which so well represents the denomination chiefly concerned, an outspoken recognition of what we regard as mischievous. Our contemporary writes:—

"We doubt whether there is a single one of those who have to do with Cheshunt College at the present moment who conforms to the terms of the Trust, and to enforce terms of that kind on men in these days is nothing short of monstrous. . . . The narrow bigotry of the Trust deed has certainly not been observed either in letter or spirit."

This criticism of the Trust is none too severe. But at present it exists, and we cannot but regret that honourable men are found to express their belief in the thing they disbelieve, even though the subscription be regarded as a matter of mere form. It is a dangerous form. The Trust deed needs altering; the whole question of trusts of the sort calls for drastic action, and with the arguments of the Examiner in favour of the necessary legislation we heartily concur.

DR. R. F. HORTON contributed to last Saturday's Hampstead and Highgate Express a warmly appreciative notice of the new volume of Dr. Brooke Herford's sermons, "Anchors of the Soul." Of Mr. Wicksteed's biographical sketch, prefixed to the sermons, he speaks as "a little masterpiece of accurate and sympathetic delineation," in which "the man stands out, just the man we knew, strong, generous, inspiring, humorous, intensely human, and absolutely controlled by his religious convictions."

THE rest of Dr. Horton's notice we take the liberty of reproducing in full:—

It was impossible to know Brooke Herford without respecting and admiring him, and none could respect and admire him more than they who differed from him in opinion. Indeed, it was in contact with those who regarded him with suspicion as a Unitarian that some of his finest qualities came into evidence. He always managed to surpass his opponents in generosity, and, if opinions could be proved correct by the temper, the dignity, and the unaffected charity of him who entertains them, his opinions would be very surely established.

It may be strange for me to say, me who hold so strongly the deity of Our Lord Jesus Christ, speaking of him who felt constrained to deny it, and yet I must say it—he was in character and spirit one of the most Christian men I have ever known. To hear him mention Christ always did me good. There was the ring of loyalty and devotion in his tone. And it was always a privilege to meet him in any work, for he gave one new heart and hope.

The sermons are very remarkable; they are practical and forceful. A breeze seems to blow through them; and they are worthy of the author of "Religion in England." It is not so much that they have a literary touch; but they are intensely religious, they throb with life, they put out hands and lay hold of heart and conscience.

It was well for Brooke Herford that he spent some years in the strong New England air, and felt the inspiration of that freedom which is at once so strange and so stimulating to men brought up in England. But it was well, too, that he returned to England for his closing years. And we in Hampstead are grateful that he came here, and lived his wholesome, vigorous, and loving life among us, and then lay down without murmuring to pass quietly into the regions beyond.

I shall always be glad that I knew him, and through him learned to understand better fellow-Christians from whom I seem fundamentally to differ. Did I hope, did I pray, that he would come to see eye to eye with me? I confess that I did. To have heard him defend the truth of Christ, as I understand it, would have been an unspeakable joy. But there was no doubt in my mind as to Christ's recognition of him, and I look forward eagerly to seeing him again, when I see my Pilot face to face. Meanwhile I am thankful for this memorial volume, and specially grateful to Mr. Wicksteed for his admirable part in it.

WHEN your own burden is heaviest, you can always lighten a little some other burden.—G. S. Merriam.

CHRISTMAS SONG.

BY THE REV. R. E. B. MACLELLAN, OF BRIDPORT.

In the INQUIRER of Dec. 21, 1844.

IN the days when we were Christmassing,
a long time ago,
While skies were keenly blue above, and earth was crisp below,
The trees with glittering icicles like richest gems were hung,
And Robin Redbreast, on a spray, his English Carol sung;
But all was bright and snug within, in spite of frost and snow,
In the days when we were Christmassing—
a long time ago.

Oh! 'twas a joy to meet the friends, who long had been unseen,
Who first had led our youthful steps in Spring-Time o'er the green;
Who shared the little joys and cares of childhood's guileless hour,
And eke the deeper thoughts and loves of manhood's day of power;
Warm hands were clasped, and greetings kind were bandied to and fro,
In the days when we were Christmassing—
a long time ago.

The snow-white cloth was quickly spread with England's bounteous cheer,
And 'twas summer in our hearts, altho'
'twas winter in the year;
The holly, with its pointed leaves and berries red, was bright,
But affections that were ever green made far a fairer sight;
And sweet the greeting with our love
beneath the misletoe,
In the days when we were Christmassing—
a long time ago.

Now, grateful for this blessing that this kindly season lends,
Here's a bumper to our absent, and to our present friends!
No honest joy this world affords, let us,
good folks, despise,
But still resolve, whate'er befall, to be both glad and wise.
When next we meet together may our hearts as kindly glow
As in days when we were Christmassing—
a long time ago.

THE Christian Register of Dec. 1 has a memorial notice of Mrs. Ednah D. Cheyney, one of whose hymns, "At first I prayed for light," is in the "Essex Hall Hymnal." Mrs. Cheyney, whose maiden name was Littlehale, was born in Boston, Mass., in 1824. She had only three years of married life, her husband, Seth W. Cheyney, having died in 1856. She was a member of Theodore Parker's congregation, and among her friends were Emerson, Whittier, and Lowell. She was a woman of the widest interests and many beneficent activities.

INWARD life, force, activity, this it must be our aim to call forth and build up in all our teachings of the young, especially in religious teaching.—Channing.

THAT one unquestioned text we read,
All doubt beyond, all fear above;
Nor crackling pile, nor cursing creed
Can burn or blot it: God is Love.

O. W. Holmes.

CHRISTMAS ON GORTEEN.

By Mary Ralph.

It was the forenoon of Christmas Eve, a day of cloudless sunshine. Outside the door of an Irish cabin, high up on a wide hillside, a dispensary doctor stood beside his horse, giving last instructions to a girl who was listlessly holding the bridle-rein. As the doctor dived into his saddle-bag for something, Molly Meara looked out over the noble panorama of fields and wood and river with a patient sorrow which, in reality, blinded her to all outward things. Suddenly, however, her listlessness vanished, her colour fled, her lips parted, and she stared at something moving far below her amongst the faded bracken, with an agony of yearning in her eyes.

"Why, Molly, what's the matter? Is there a ghost coming up the side of Gorteen in broad daylight?" Dr. Moloney exclaimed, as, turning to her, he was startled by the change in her appearance. But even while he spoke the girl's arms fell limp at her side, and her eyes filled with tears of bitter disappointment.

"No, yer honour," she answered meekly, "Jimmy Doolan is no ghost; but I see be the yella letthers in his hand that there's an American mail in; an' he's gone by without e'er a one for me. I'm heart-broken entirely about me sisther Winnie. I dunno what at all can be the matther with her that she never wrote a line since me mother is ill, an' she always so constant at it before. Six weeks to-day it is, docther, since me mother was took bad and not a word from Winnie, an' here's Christmas come an' all. An' me mother talkin' of her be night and be day. Shure, sometimes, I dunno in the world how I'm to live through id an' not let on to her that I'm unaisy. But I'm in dhread o' me life something must have happened to her. Maybe it's dead she is, an' that'll kill me mother"—and Molly, worn out by watching and anxiety, laid her forehead against the horse's neck and sobbed convulsively.

The doctor watched her silently for a full minute without speaking.

"She is a brick," he thought, as he looked at the girl's thin cheek and threadbare gown. "I wonder how she has kept soul and body together this last six weeks. Not one in a hundred could have done it. And now that minx of a sister——"

Presently, in a kind but bantering tone, he said: "Now, Molly, if you think you could cry as well on your ass's neck as on Simon's I'll be getting on. I have a good many miles to cover. Here's a weeny pinch of tea and a bit of sugar Mrs. Moloney sent you. . . . There, there, hold your tongue; and don't let anyone hear a word of it; mind now. I can't be carrying tea to every old woman, and they're as jealous as Lucifer. I know 'em! And, hark ye, Molly, don't be wearing yourself out fretting about Winnie. Dead! She's no more dead than I am. When you have another night's sound sleep you'll know better than to talk such nonsense. But remember what I told you at first—your mother won't be out of danger till she's well, and you mustn't by word or look make her anxious about your sister. Dead, forsooth! Married! I say: much more likely. Be sure you send for the medicine. Now then, Simon." And the kind-hearted doctor was off and away round the shoulder of the hill before Molly had dried her eyes. In her apron were the two packets, and she thought, as she laid them on the kitchen table, "'Tis fine long fingers Mrs. Moloney must have, if them's what she calls a 'weeny pinch,' the crather."

On the bed in the inner room lay Molly's mother, slowly recovering from typhus fever. Even wasting illness had not destroyed the likeness between mother and daughter. Both were tall. The elder woman's hair had once been as soft and black as Molly's, and both had the deep grey eyes so common in the finest type of Irish beauty. They came of "a good stock," and neither poverty or toil had dulled their brains nor lessened their ardent family affection.

Molly leaned over her mother, who looked up at her with a quiet smile.

"Docther Moloney says yer goin' on finely, alanna, glory be to God," Molly said softly; "an' it's the loveliest day ever kem from the heavens. It'll be no time at all now till ye're as sthrong as a rope agin."

The mother's lips formed the one word, "Winnie."

The room was dark, and not even her eager gaze could detect any faltering as Molly answered,—

"Whethen now, don't you remimber I tould ye how well Winnie was in the last letther, an' the rint in id an' all, God bless her. Lie still, now, till I clane up the place a bit, an' get ye somethin' to wet yer lips."

Very feebly the mother enclosed the daughter's fingers in her own wasted ones, and drawing her down she whispered—

"'Tis yerself has the hard time of it, achushla. I offen think maybe it 'ud be as good if ye'd let me go out of id altogether."

"Arrah whisht, mother. What undher the sun do ye think Winnie'd say to me if I was to do that?" Molly answered.

And then, unable to bear more, overwhelmed by the dread uncertainty as to where Winnie had gone, and whether their mother would not really be nearer to her if she passed into the unseen, she gently withdrew from her mother's clasp, saying,

"It's a dhrop o' nourishmint ye want, achushla machree, an' not to be romancin' that-a-way," and went into the kitchen.

She knelt on the hearth to blow up the turf fire, and as she knelt she prayed fervently under her breath. "Oh, merciful Father," was her cry, "help me to save me mother. She's pulled through so far, but shure her life hangs be a thread. Oh Lord, keep me tongue an' me lips, and don't let a word pass 'em unbeknownst to me."

The day wore on, and Molly busied herself about many things. There were hens and a pig to look after, and turf to bring in from the rick, not to speak of the "claning up of the place" for Christmas, and waiting upon the invalid. In the afternoon Molly took her knitting and sat beside the bed where her mother slept peacefully. The daylight was fading when she awoke, evidently much refreshed and very happy. She watched Molly in silence for a while as the needles flew, till the girl, seeing she was awake, made her tea and began to feed her with it.

"Ah, ye poor slave!" the mother murmured fondly. "Shure what would I do without you at all. I had the beautifullest dhrame this minit," she went on slowly, in the intervals of her little meal, "that ever ye heard tell, about Winnie. I thought I seen her comin' sailin' in to the harbour at Queenstown, no less; an' a clane smart-lookin' boy* behint her."

"'Twas on a broomstick she was sailin,' I suppose," Molly asked, in desperate fear of breaking down.

"Ah, give over yer humbuggin', now, Molly, . . . an' let yer poor mother alone for wanst. . . . 'Twas on a ship, ov coorse, she was, an' id kem on like a bird. She never took her eyes off the land she was comin' to——"

"The ship didn't, you mane?"

"Och, musha, Molly, it's aisy seen ye had the good news of her, to be so light-hearted. I mane Winnie looked towardst ould Ireland like as if she wanted to kneel on the first sod she kem to. An' her husbant——Did she ever make mintion of e'er a boyo at all? I do be forgettin'."

"Why, mother, don't ye remimber her sayin' she met with the Widow Conlon's son out there, an' he ridin' in a buggy as grand as a lord, an' shiny rings on the fella, and a goold watch as thick as a dog-collar. An' he that good-natured he'd give her the half of all he was worth if she'd have id."

"To be sure; 'tis yerself is in the right ov id. Well, at all events there was someone with her in the shape of a husbant."

"Did they land?" Molly asked.

"Well, now, 'tis a quare thing you should ax me that. I couldn't see whether they did or they didn't. It began to snow, and thin I woke."

The tea was finished, the invalid was tired, and both were silent.

Late that night Molly stole outside the cabin door for a breath of fresh air. Overhead the moon rode triumphantly across a cloudless sky. The east wind smote the girl's cheeks lightly.

"'Tisn't that wind 'ud bring Winnie home if she was comin'," she thought. "But what 'ud she do that for?"

She looked above her and all around over the sleeping country.

"Shure God is good, an' God is everywhere," she said to herself. "We're ony weeny crachures in His sight. He wouldn't harm us, nor let no one else if He had His own way in all. Wherever Winnie is He has her safe, an' I'll thry to be contint, for another while anyway."

* * * *

The dawn was red behind Gorteen on Christmas morning when Molly Meara opened the cabin door. She stepped outside, going, from force of habit, to the point from which she could see the long stretch of white road, though she knew well that no Jimmy Doolan was to be expected that day. A speck was on the road, however—a side-car she presently made out, with two—no, three—figures on it.

"Oh then God be good to whoever it is that's dying," she prayed, crossing herself. "Shure it can on'y be the priest flyin' along at that rate up to the foot of Gorteen."

The car came on.

"'Tis no one at the farm, then, thank mercy. But who can he be called to? If that one beside the priest isn't a woman it's a wondher to me. . . . They've passed Egans' now. The poor ould horse is payin' for their hurry, whoever they are. 'Tis nearly like as if it was a runaway match. But where 'ud they run to up here? There's nayther priest nor parson to marry anyone on this side ov the hill.''

As the car came on a thought tingled along her nerves which seemed to stop her heart beats. A few moments more and the vehicle turned into the cart track which ran below her mother's cottage at the distance of a couple of fields. She waited no longer. Living or dying she must know who they were that drove up Gorteen Mountain in that wild haste on Christmas morning. A sickening certainty of disappointment weighted her feet like lead, but she fought with it and flew down the hillside to intercept the car. The travellers saw her, and a shriek, half sob half laughter, told Molly that it was her sister Winnie who had come back to the old home.

To tell of how the sisters laughed and cried over one another, and of how the husband sent the car round by the roadwith the boxes, while he climbed the hillside to his own mother's cottage; and of how Molly recollected herself and thought of her mother wanting her breakfast, and of how she '' made Winnie sinsible that she was to find a great change in mother, but was not to let on to anything ''; and of how they went together to the mother's bedside—all this is utterly beyond the power of my pen. It is equally beyond me to tell all the contents of the boxes, which spread astonishment, not unmixed with envy, all over that barony. Suffice it that not a neighbour who had shown a kindness to the Widow Meara or the Widow Conlon was forgotten by the grateful young couple, whose hearts, always large, had grown more generous in prosperity. Mrs. Meara throve apace on such beef-tea and jelly as had never been seen in that region before.

It was bit by bit, in the lengthening days of the New Year, when Mrs. Meara was able to sit by the fire in the kitchen, that Winnie told the story of how she and Paddy happened to return so opportunely. Then it came out that she had never got Molly's first letter telling of their mother's illness. The town in which she was living had been burned to the ground, and with it was burned a letter which she had just "mailed" to Ireland. The exertions she made helping her employers to save their children and their goods, together with the shock and exposure, completely prostrated her, and for a fortnight everything had to be kept from her. When at last she was able to read her letters, she was sitting, one day, crying her eyes out over them, when '' in walked Paddy to visit with me. I used to see quite a little of him, for he always called on his rounds.

'' 'Hullo,' he says, 'was it you set the town afire? Or if not, what are ye crying for?' says he, coming in like a sunbeam.

'' So I told him all that had happened, and how sick I had been, and that mother had been very sick and might be dying. He took two turns up and down the room, and then he came and stood by me with his hand on my shoulder.

'' 'Winnie,' he says, 'how long have I known you, and you me?'

'' 'Twenty-three years,' said I.

'' 'Wal, for twenty of them years, I reckon, I've had two ideas in my head—to bring my mother to America to end her days in comfort, and to be a good husband to you, Winnie. Ye'll never get one that loves ye more, nor will have a better wish to be kind to ye. I've picked up dollars faster by a lot than I ever hoped; and I meant anyway to go back to the old place in March to fetch my mother. But now there's your mother. It's a cosy chimney-corner she'll be wanting, and a rocking chair, after typhus fever, and no more nurse-tending nor washtubs. If anything was to happen to her, Molly will be left alone in the world. Ye'll never be well yerself till ye get out of here. Marry me now, Winnie, there's a good girl, and we'll sail for home next week. By the time we reach Queenstown ye'll have the roses on your cheeks again, and your black hair shining like a bog-pool with the sun on it.'

'' So, with that, the people I was with hung flags round the shanty they had run up for me after the fire, and they made a great spread by way of a wedding, and in three days Paddy and I were married.

'' 'Why didn't I write then?'

'' Well, Molly, mavourneen, I did, to tell you the plain honest truth; and when I went to put on my Sunday frock, to land in, at Queenstown, if there I didn't find my letter in the pocket of it! I never had an easy moment from that on. I stood in the bow of the ship and all my mind seemed running forward to the land. There was a short little snowstorm just as we came into Queenstown, and I prayed that as many angels as there were snowflakes guard ye and comfort ye, if I made ye uneasy. And, mother,'' Winnie ended, in the sweet low vernacular of the hillside, '' I felt all the way across like as if it was the spirit of the Holy Child that kem at Christmas was with us two childher, bringin' us home.''

THE PEOPLE OF ENGLAND AND WALES.

II.—WHAT THEY ARE DOING.

BY far the most difficult branch of the census investigation relates to the occupations of the people. To this subject, we are told, the greatest consideration is given. That this must be so is fairly apparent from the make up of the county parts which contain the detailed results: if we take, e.g., the London volume, we find that more than a half of it is concerned with this question, or about 90 pages of tables. The figures are classified under nearly 400 headings, although we use, of course, many more than this number of methods of earning a living and spending our time. A large and strangely interesting piece of work was necessary before the actual work of preparing the report could be done. This was nothing less than the compiling of a dictionary, a dictionary of occupations, a work which, as may easily be understood, '' demands much technical knowledge.'' This dictionary gives the designation of over 15,000 occupations. By the aid of this a corps of trained clerks reduced the actual returns made by the people to the 393 headings which are used in the reports. Books of instructions were also issued to the enumerators, to aid them in checking the popular affection for vagueness. People, e.g., gave in their occupation as '' collar-maker ''; they had to be pressed for the further particulars as to whether they made collars for beasts or men, and if the latter, whether they were paper collars.

The mass is first broken up by the distinction of occupied and unoccupied. The latter class includes a minority of males (16·3 per cent), a majority of females (68·4 per cent.). The unoccupied class contains the children, married women engaged in unpaid domestic duties, such men of the tramp class as do not return themselves as '' labourers,'' &c., and members of the wealthy class not entered as '' barristers '' or what not; lastly, all retired persons with some few exceptions, as the clergy, who are always entered under their profession even when they have ceased from its active practice. It is worth noticing that during the decade 1891–1901 there has been a slight increase of occupied males, from 83·1 per cent. to 83·7 per cent., and an appreciable decrease of occupied females, from 34·4 per cent. to 31·6 per cent. This decrease is mostly in domestic service, and partly in appearance only, since in 1891 '' daughters and other female relatives '' engaged in household management were returned as occupied; in 1901 they appear as unoccupied. This is matter of classification. But this cause is not held to explain the whole decrease.

For purposes of easier comparison the large number of separate occupations are brought into twenty-two groups or orders. First on the list is the general or local government of the country. This accounts for nearly 200,000 persons; in fact the number is greater, for although the heading includes the charwomen employed at Government offices, it excludes the larger number of telegraph and telephone clerks. The percentage engaged in Government service has increased by 37·3 in the decade. This is only what we might expect, for the apparatus of Government yearly becomes more comprehensive. This is especially the case in the Municipal service, which increased by 47·9 per cent. in the same period. The State plays an increasing part in the life of the citizen.

In making this and other comparisons it should be observed that the population increased 12·1 per cent. in the decade. In the teaching profession the rate of increase is smaller, though the numbers engaged are larger. The decimal increase is 18·1 per cent., showing a more rapid growth in education than in the population. We turn to the clergy, and are met with the opposite tendency. The actual number of clergymen, priests (including monks), and ministers is greater than in 1891; in proportion to the population it is less. In the cheaper forms of service, such as missionaries, scripture readers, and sisters of mercy, there is indeed some real increase. But the figures do seem to indicate a slighter care in the provision of religious instruction. Against this, by way of contrast, may be set an enormous increase of 48 per cent. under the heading of exhibitions, games, &c.

There are significant changes to be observed in the more material occupations. Agriculture, employing some 12,000,000, shows again a decline, an absolute falling off in numbers, a considerable decrease in proportion to population. The textile workers, who form a rather smaller group, also show a falling off, including a decrease in by far its most important branch, the cotton industry, which is described as "a matter of grave concern." It is a curious fact, however, that in the particular of "lace-making" there is an increase. This is entirely in the machine industry, and seems to indicate that if staple trades decline there is an increasing market for cheap luxuries. Mining, on the other hand, has largely increased; this is specially the case with coal mining, and is the industrial fact that lies behind our increasing exports. The mining figures bring out a fact that might escape notice, viz., that copper is for practical purposes almost extinct. Only 789 men are returned as engaged in getting it, as compared with twenty times that number in 1851. We should expect, and we find, a large increase in the numbers engaged in the carrying trades. This is most striking in the matter of tramways, which employed only 69 persons in 1871. The number at the last census was over 18,000.

It remains to say something about the relation of industry to age and sex. As regards age, the first fact to engage our attention is the very satisfactory one of a diminished number of child workers, of those under 15. This is specially noticeable in relation to the mischievous device of the mid-century educationalists, for the number of half-timers in 1901 is considerably less than half what it was in 1891. At the same time, and although many counties are entirely free from them, there are still a large number of children thus overburdened.

Halifax, Burnley, and Blackburn are amongst the worst towns in the employment of children between the ages of 10 and 13, and in the case of children under 14, Bolton must be added. At the other end of the scale we find a decrease in the number of men over 55. This undoubtedly reveals what is one of the serious mischiefs of our industrial system. Men of 55 ought not to be past work. If they are, it is a condemnation of the work, not of the men. It were better that the children should remain longer at school, and their fathers longer in employment. Whether the employment of the boys is the direct cause of the unemployment of the men, the Registrar does not decide on statistical grounds. But he does draw attention to the fact that in towns where many children are employed, many men over 55 are unoccupied.

The latest report shows a marked improvement on previous ones in the way of recording the figures with regard to women's work. Hitherto female workers have all been classed together. Now, the married and widowed women are separated from the single. And it becomes more possible to decide where, and to what extent, women are forced into the mill or workshop and away from the home, where, so commonly, there are children who claim their care. On this point there is a sentence of stern reminder: "The inevitable neglect from which these latter (the children) must suffer in their earliest years cannot be regarded as a suitable preparation for their own premature employment as wage earners."* It seems probable that some substitution of single for married women is going on, although we are told that the figures are not conclusive on this point. The continual changes in industrial processes are shown by the increase or decrease of men or women in various occupations. Trades that were women's occupations are passing into the hands of men and vice versa. Thus there is an increase of male workers in laundry service (no doubt as a result of the use of machinery), in lace manufacture, and in glove making. On the other hand, tailoring and bootmaking become increasingly women's employments.

By far the most considerable branch of female employment is that of domestic service. For the first time the number of women shows a falling off. In comparison with the women, the men in indoor domestic service are few. But they show some increase, notably in the case of foreigners. The striking difference between one district and another is shown by the figures. Thus, e.g., while in Hampstead 4 families out of every 5 employ servants, in Shoreditch there is barely more than 1 family out of 20 that does so. A cognate employment is that of the charwoman. The wealthy suburb has 240 within its limits; the poor East Central borough, over 1,000. Not that Shoreditch is more able to pay charwomen. But these casual workers, toiling for the well-to-do, live in the slum, live herded together, in penury and insecurity. This article is already long, or it would be full of sad instruction to proceed from this relation of industry and sex to the closely allied topic of industry and the home. We must be satisfied simply to mark the connection in passing, and refrain from touching more closely on this most intimate form of the environment, the persistent action of the immediate influence of habitation on industry and on the industrial worker.

It is in their influence on human beings, their lives and characters, their health, emotions, and thoughts, that all these particulars possess their most pungent instructiveness. The census is not only, perhaps not mainly, for the economist, just as industry is not or should not be, mainly for commodities. The census is an account of men and women. The figures, for those who take the trouble to understand them, make one great document, which should be on the table of every teacher. A man's powers are furthered or curbed, his possibility is conditioned, by the environment in which he lives, and the work in which he is engaged. There are two motives which have above all others influenced men.

Religious motives are more intense than economic; but their direct action seldom extends over so large a part of life. For the business by which a person earns his livelihood generally fills his thoughts during by far the greater part of those hours in which his mind is at its best.*

In the census reports we are presented with a vast accumulation of material for the understanding of this most extensive portion of good and bad men's lives. We have glanced at some of the influences, those of habit and occupation, which make men, or keep them what they are in outward seeming as well as in the hidden psychical reality. Those of us who approach all problems from the standpoint of what life should be, cannot afford to neglect such assistance as is here offered to us. We are told where they live and what they do; we are by imaginative study to learn how these things re-act on them, what range of emotional and intellectual life is favoured by these surrounding forces, how far man may realise through them his utmost innate powers, whether and in what way he may escape from such evil as is in them tending to dull and coarsen the fibre of the mind. In order to use these external factors of life, we must master them; and before we can expect to master them, it is necessary to understand them. The study of sociology, of the complex facts of human existence, is requisite as a basis from which the ideals may be appealed to and set free. An opportunity for such a study is provided by the reports of the census. In them are mere figures; from them deep, rousing thought.

POPULAR RELIGIOUS LITERATURE IN GERMANY.

THREE more small German books, dealing with religious subjects, in the series of Religionsgeschichtliche Volksbücher, edited by Lic. F. M. Schiele, of Marburg, are the subjects of this brief notice.* Their aim is to provide a short popular account from the pen of an expert of the results of modern critical and historical study. They are well printed, and are issued in an attractive paper cover for a few pence. The enterprise is an interesting one, as it shows a desire to bring the theological scholarship of Germany out of the universities, and to translate its technical language into popular speech. It is an experiment well worthy of imitation in this country. If small books of this kind can be issued in Germany for threepence or fourpence, cannot we do a similar educational work for liberal religion at an equally popular price? It is, however, a mistake to suppose that the eminent scholar is necessarily best qualified to be the exponent of his own subject to ordinary people who have no technical knowledge. Professor Holtzmann of Strassburg writes upon the rise of the New Testament—"Die Entstehung des Neuen Testaments"—and he has given a clear outline of the collection of its various parts and their gradual assumption of canonical status and authority. He hardly escapes, however, from the trammels of a dry and unpopular style, and we are not sure that his little treatise will not be more useful as a summary for those who know than as an introduction for people who have still everything to learn. Professor Paul Wernle, of Basel, on the other hand, is master of an eminently popular style. He writes in short, crisp sentences, and with the enthusiasm of a teacher who wishes to produce conviction. He has taken for his subject the Sources for the Life of Jesus—"Die Quellen des Lebens Jesu"—and in the course of about ninety pages he succeeds in giving a survey of the direction and chief problems of recent study of the Gospels. He strikes us as particularly successful in his treatment of the Synoptic problem. He deals with it in broad outline, and avoids the confusion produced by a mass of intricate detail. In other words, he knows what to omit. There are several matters in regard to which we want to express dissent, and he seems to us often to go beyond what the evidence requires in negative statement. He leaves us too little, and he has all the German fondness for vigorous literary theories, which are so liable to break down at the first touch of human nature. But as a clear and interesting statement of his own position, and of a great deal in addition that is common ground with most competent students, nothing could be better. We have also before us a small book in another section of the same series devoted to the history of the growth of doctrine and comparative religion. It is from the pen of Professor Bertholet, of Basel, and deals with the belief in the Transmigration of Souls—"Seelenwanderung." The enterprise has made an execellent start and we hope that it will be followed here not only with sympathy but also with emulation. Probably some numbers would repay translation, but popular needs vary in different countries, and it would be better if a group of English scholars could be organised for similar work.

A MINISTER'S GARDEN.*

"HORTULUS PASTORIS" is a pretty title for a volume of poems, though crook and spade do not commonly go together. There are some old lines which tell of one who

> A little garden made,
> And hedged it with a little palisade.

This Mr. Thomas also has done, and he invites us to enter. The square of the garden, says Bacon, should leave ground enough for side alleys. It is by the side alleys that the poet's pleasance differs from the common garden-plot. He does not set out his fancies in obvious rows and unmistakable masses. He makes us find them. We have to follow down his meaning by winding paths, and sometimes be content to lose it. These flower poems of our pastor are not to be easily gathered; some are very delicate, some a little prickly, some a trifle beyond our reach. His garden is in parts a maze, too difficult to be threaded at one reading; but the difficulty need be no discouragement to anyone but a hasty reviewer. Some of the poems have already appeared in these columns, and readers may now give them the second reading which they deserve. When Mr. Thomas is obscure it is generally through extreme fastidiousness in the choice of words and excessive refinement of construction; taste is satisfied at the cost of interpretation. For thoughtfulness and power of expression we give the palm to "The Old Téméraire," and among the verses finely finished and presented, yet fully declaring their meaning, are these on "Spring":—

> Sweet Spring, by Hope attended, strayed
> Through woods and meads and o'er the hills;
> Upon her breasts were violets laid,
> Her brows begirt with daffodils.
> Warm tears bedashed her girlish face,
> Not yet were banished chilly fears—
> She blushed to weep in Hope's embrace,
> And smiles shone bright through falling tears.

The first two lines of the second verse, and the felicity of the one word "bedashed," make a poem in themselves.

Of the three translations from Heine, the first, a rendering of Du bist wie eine Blume, is as perfect as it is given to translations to be. The second is full of Heine's mingling of pathos and irony; but the third seems to us to lack the swing and smoothness of the original. Some of us tried our hands at this bewitching Mein Kind, wir waren Kinder in early days, when E. L. H. T. was disporting himself with a toy spade, like the "sweet maniacs" whom he describes in the poem Le Jardinomanie.

Two of the sonnets we could wish away. Political and religious animosities, if they become the pastor, are out of place in a garden. But there are few soils in which some weed may not be found.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

II.—THE ROMAN CHILD.

PALESTINE, as you know, in the time of Christ, was part of the Roman Empire. The Roman Empire, like the British Empire to-day, was of great extent, and included many countries. It stretched from Spain to Persia, and from Britain to the North African shore. The centre of this vast government was Rome, and Rome was then the richest and most powerful city in the world. We have to find out, if we can, how children lived in Rome at the time when Jesus was a child in Nazareth.

Latin writers never speak of their own childhood. Either they did not think those early years worth hearing about, or else they could not think of them with pleasure. How unlike our own English poets and authors!

Tacitus, a Latin historian, has many things to say about the Jews, and he is never tired of saying how much they differed from all other people. One of the strangest things to him in Jewish life was the fact that all Jewish children were allowed to live; the Jewish father did not decide whether his new-born child should live or not. This was not the case in Rome. In Rome a new-born child was placed at the father's feet, and if the father turned away, the child was taken away to die of starvation or exposure to cold, unless it were rescued by a passer-by to be reared as a slave. This is a horrible thing to read of now, but no notice was taken of it then; even the mother's feelings were not thought of. A sickly child was drowned at once. Roman gentlemen were highly educated, and never thought of themselves as barbarous and cruel. That shows how easy it is to be highly educated, and still to be unfeeling.

Until his seventh or eighth year a boy was kept in the inner part of the house, where the women lived, and seldom saw his father's face. He was waited on by slaves. He was happy enough in his way, but he had no part in the life that was going on about him. No one cared to know his thoughts or to add to his amusements. As for religion, it meant nothing to him. No one in Rome thought of loving the gods, though they offered sacrifices to them, and there was nothing that a child could understand or share in the religion of his parents. All days were alike, and of his own actions he hardly knew which were right and which were wrong; he only knew which were displeasing to others and which were pleasing. There were many things to tempt him to wrong. He would often see his mother's slaves cruelly punished for the most trifling faults. He would hear of wild beast fights, and of the gladiatorial shows in the circus, in which slaves, prisoners of war, and condemned criminals were armed against their will, and made to fight as fiercely as wild beasts, one with another. He was happy indeed if he had such a father as was Seneca, the famous philosopher, who lived exactly at that time. In one of his letters he says that his little Marcus would charm away any one's troubles with his pretty ways. Horace, too, in one of his poems, speaks proudly and affectionately of his father, who was only a freedman, and therefore had once been a slave.

For playthings Roman children had hoops, tops, dolls, and balls, and instead of marbles, nuts. They also had knuckle-bones used as counters, or dice. They played with sand, like the Greek children in Homer's time. They would stretch out the fingers of one hand quickly, and the other side had to guess how many fingers were stretched out. They played another game called "odd and even," the odd or even things being hidden in the hand. Sometimes they played with bricks and hobby-horses, as you do, and sometimes they harnessed mice to little toy wagons, as you, I hope, will never do. Not that this proves them to have been unkind to animals; they were encouraged to keep pets, and, strange to say, animals were more kindly treated in ancient Rome than they are now treated in modern Italy; but a superstitious feeling about hurting little creatures may have been partly the reason. One writer of that time says that even children played at gladiators, and that I can well believe; cruelty to human beings was commoner than cruelty to domestic animals, and was thought to be more amusing.

How were the children dressed? The children of free, well-to-do parents wore flowing robes bordered with purple, and from their necks hung bubble-shaped bosses of gold. At fifteen a boy gave up the embroidered robe and the gold token, and wore a plain gown like a man. The children of the poor were better off in one way, for they wore short tunics, and their arms and legs were more free.

Something now about school. When a boy was old enough to go to school, he set forth with a steady slave in attendance to keep him out of harm's way. Sometimes other slaves followed, to carry his books and writing-tablet. The trusted slave was called a pædagogus, a "boy-leader"; from this comes our word "pedagogue," and perhaps also the word "page." At school the boys were taught reading, writing, and arithmetic, and sometimes a little poetry and the art of speaking in public; but, if I remember rightly what we used to read about them, the lessons were very dull, and the masters were very severe.

Rome is still Rome, and the children still play morra—the finger-flashing game—and go to school. But Rome is now a city of pictures, and no pictures are so much loved as those of Christ as a child. You may see them in the galleries, in the churches, in the streets. Sometimes an image of the Christ-Child is laid in a manger, and figures of an ox and an ass stand near, and children come to hear the story of Bethlehem once more. The memory of that story is with us everywhere. If there were no pictures to remind us, we should still, I hope, remember it. For eighteen centuries the thought of the Holy Child has made children happier, and more willing to be good, and has made older people more gentle with children and more patient.

In one of the churches there is a picture in which three Roman soldiers with helmets on their heads approach the Child Jesus, seated on a raised seat, and lifting up a hand to bless. To a Roman of heathen times the picture would have had no meaning, would have seemed absurd, but its meaning was clear enough to those who lived when Rome, the city of warriors, had become a Christian city, and had submitted itself to the Prince of Peace. Every Christmas ought to bring nearer to us all the meaning and the blessing of that "sweet reign of light and love" which began when Jesus was born king of men. He is the true conqueror of the world.

AN OLD NATIVITY PLAY.*

IN some papers a little while ago I tried to show that some of the Old Testament stories are best understood if we think of them as scenes of a sort of drama. Many of those stories have really been acted as miracle-plays, and others are quite suitable for that purpose. But I want to tell you now of an old play that has been made and performed, the subject of which is taken from the New Testament, and the most appropriate time for which would be Christmas.

You can understand that when the name and works of Jesus had become very widely known, when, after his death, the number of those who believed in him increased, there was great curiosity to learn all about his birth and early life. All that was really known was that his father was a carpenter, that his mother's name was Mary, that he had several brothers and sisters, and that the home of the family was Nazareth.

But people wanted to know much more. And as Jesus had been so good and great they thought that every thing that happened to him must have been wonderful. And there are two curiously different stories told about his birth. One of them tells how, when Jesus was born, wise men from the East were led by a special star which they saw to go to Jerusalem, and there to inquire about the birth of a child that was to be king of the Jews. It does not say how many wise men there were, or how far they had come. But it says that, having gone to Jerusalem, and having learned from the scribes that, according to prophecy, Jesus was to be born in Bethlehem, they set out for that village; and, sure enough, the star shone out again and guided them to the very house. They found the child, presented to him costly gifts, and returned home.

A totally different story is told by St. Luke. Jesus was born in Bethlehem because his parents happened to have to go there to get their names registered, in accordance with a decree of the Emperor of Rome. The little town was crowded, and cattle-sheds had to be made into lodgings for the visitors. And in the night, when Jesus was born, a choir of angels sang hymns of praise to God and were heard by shepherds in the fields. The shepherds were told by an angel particulars of the birth of the wonderful child, and sent away to Bethlehem. They obeyed the angel's directions, went to Bethlehem, found the inn, and, just as the angel had told them, the child was discovered lying in a manger—that is to say, his cradle was made of a sort of trough which was generally used for hay and oats and other food eaten by the cattle.

The two stories do not agree, but that made no difficulty for those who made them into a play. Two things they well understood—namely, that Jesus was a wonderful child, and that his birth into this world was a great blessing. Contradiction in small matters was of no importance. In the old play one of the speakers swears by Mahomet, who did not live till hundreds of years later; and another utters a fine official speech in French. Never mind all that; the right spirit is there. It means: Christ is born, we should be happy.

The first person who speaks is Isaiah the prophet:

> Now be merry every mon,
> For this deed briefly in Israel shall be done.
> And before the Father in throne,
> That shall glad us all."

Then an angel comes and speaks to Mary.

Gabriel:

> Hail, Mary, full of grace,
> Our Lord God is with thee
> Above all women that ever was,
> Lady, blessed mayst thou be.

Then we have a representation of the journey to Bethlehem, and Mary getting tired and ill, and Joseph going away to find some women to wait upon her.

The scene changes; and we hear a shepherd complaining that the night is so dark he cannot see his sheep, and he has lost his brother shepherds.

> But now to make their heartes light
> Now will I full right
> Stand upon this lo [meadow],
> And to them cry all my might—
> Full well my voice they know:
> What ho, fellows! ho! ho! ho!

A second shepherd speaks:

> Hark, sir, hark, I hear our brother on the lo,
> This is his voice right well I know;
> Therefore toward him let us go,
> And follow his voice aright.

The shepherds find each other, and sit down together to eat food. As they eat, one of them notices a very bright star, and shows it to his fellows.

Then they hear a choir of angels sing "Glory to God."

Third Shepherd:

> Hark, they sing in the clouds so clear,
> Heard I never so merry a quere [choir],
> Now gentle brethren draw we near
> To hear their harmony.

As the shepherds go forth, they sing this delightful little verse:

> As I rode out this enderes night [the other night]
> Of three jolly shepherds I saw a sight,
> And all about their fold a star shone bright;
> They sang terli, terlow,
> So merrily the shepherds their pipes can blowe

The next scene must have been a merry one indeed for those who saw the play performed. The three shepherds by and by find the humble abode of mother and child, and then, being very poor, do not know what presents to give him. So one takes off his rough broad-brimmed hat and gives it to the baby, saying it will keep his head warm; another takes off his enormous mittens from his hands and throws them to him; and the third gives the little helpless baby his shepherd's pipe—a sort of whistle-pipe or flageolet—as if the little one could play, whereas so tiny a child could hardly be able to catch hold of it. But they have done the best they could; so they go off singing with great joy this second verse:

> Down from heaven, from heaven so high,
> Of angels there came a great company
> With mirth and joy and great solemnity,
> They sang terli, terlow,
> So merrily the shepherds their pipes can blow.

After the shepherds we have the visit of the wise men, who are represented as three kings. One of them loses himself on his journey and says—

Second King:

> Out of my way I deem that I am,
> For tokens of this country can I none see;
> Now God, that on earth madest men,
> Send me some knowledge where I be!

He meets with another king, and those two meet with a third, and they go on all together. They go and have an interview with Herod, who talks to them in pretended friendliness, and then the star leads them to the child. One offers gold, one incense, and one myrrh, and after their visit they are so tired with their journey that they all lie down out of doors to sleep. In their sleep an angel comes to warn them not to go back to Herod as they had intended. So when they awake they consult together.

Second King:

> He bade that we should go down by west
> For dread of Herod's false betray.

First King:

> So for to do it is the best
> The child that we have sought guide us the way.

Their parting is simple, and sweetly expressed:

> Now he that made us meet on plain,
> And offer to Mary in her jesayne [place of childbirth],
> He give us grace in heaven again
> All together to meet.

That well represents the feeling that we have at the close of the play. We have been with Joseph and Mary and the shepherds and the kings, heard their songs, seen their gifts. We hope to see them again, if not on earth in heaven, where all beautiful and pleasant memories gather.

THE CHRISTMAS BELLS.

THE time draws near the birth of CHRIST:
The moon is hid; the night is still;
The Christmas bells from hill to hill
Answer each other in the mist.

Four voices of four hamlets round,
From far and near, on mead and moor,
Swell out and fail, as if a door
Were shut between me and the sound:

Each voice four changes on the wind,
That now dilate, and now decrease;
Peace and goodwill, goodwill and peace,
Peace and goodwill, to all mankind.

THERE is a magic in the verse and in the music of the bells, which lifts the heart far above all sordid things, in the thought of the Christmas joy and all that it implies. Perhaps only those who have had a home, and have spent many Christmases in it, within the reach of village bells, or in a little country town, where joy and peace and quiet friendliness are easily at home, can enter fully into the richness of association, the exquisite beauty of TENNYSON'S verses, and the deep thrill of delight stirred by the sound of the bells. That music mingles with celestial harmonies, with lovely visions and the deep joy of the spirit, which knows that love is the surest, most abiding thing, stronger than any pain or dismay of this world, stronger than death. Those Christmas bells, the poet says, rule his troubled spirit, they controlled him when a boy, and even in the midst of his great sorrow, he turns his face to the light.

Rise, happy morn, rise, holy morn,
Draw forth the cheerful day from night,
O Father, touch the East, and light
The light that shone when Hope was born.

The Christmas joy will not be denied, even in such a year as this, while the war in the Far East is dragging out its slow agony, and with all the burdens of shame and distress which weigh upon the people, especially of our great cities. Hunger, poverty, degradation, miserable vice and lawless crime, dull insensibility to all nobler interests and pure affections, and on the side of wealth and luxury callousness and lawlessness no less shameful, insult to every pure and lofty ideal, degradation of manhood and womanhood, reckless denial of every claim of duty of nobler use of life — these are the ugly stains upon the picture and upon the fair fame of England; and yet the common life of the people endures, the sum of honest purpose and often heroic self-devotion, and modest happiness, is greater than the things which would overburden and destroy our faith, and there is ever more the prophecy of undying hope, because there is the heart of love, which cannot be destroyed.

And the sound of Christmas bells is mingled with the happy voices of the children, the eager greetings of the home-coming, the messages of hearty good will, of pity and loving-kindness doing good in secret ways, the steadfast greetings of tried friends, with the light of joy in their faces, which only love can give, even while they stand in the midst of the battlefield of life, and the turmoil and the foulness are close at hand, with which they, side by side, are at death-grips. The workers never despair, and they who know what love is, having found it in their homes and in the heart of friends, having tested it in a myriad acts of giving and striving, even for the unlovely, having seen its vision from afar in the holiest faces and in the light of heaven, cannot be denied their rejoicing in the great festival of love.

We turn, then, at this time, to the abiding things of our home life and true affection, of courage and faithfulness, of the inward vision of GOD, and humble consecration to His service in CHRIST'S spirit. If only we are doing our part in the great work of helpfulness—which makes for a true brotherhood and the setting fast at least of the foundations of the Divine Kingdom here on earth—we shall not be denied the children's joy, and the deeper gladness of a fellowship in which earth and heaven are one.

And for the churches, with their many separate methods and teachings, we may repeat these lines of WHITTIER'S, taken from the December number of the Atlantic Monthly. They were written in an album twenty-one years ago, when a fair was being held in aid of a little Episcopal church, and given as his contribution to the church:—

Forgive, O LORD, our severing ways,
The separate altars that we raise,
The varying tongues that speak Thy praise!

Suffice it now. In time to be
Shall one great temple rise to Thee,
Thy church our broad humanity.

White flowers of love its wall shall climb,
Sweet bells of peace shall ring its chime,
Its days shall be all holy time.

The hymn, long sought, shall then be heard,
The music of the world's accord,
Confessing CHRIST, the inward word!

That song shall swell from shore to shore,
One faith, one love, one hope restore
The seamless garb that JESUS wore!

MUSINGS.

BY A MINISTER.

X.

"ALL generations shall call me blessed." A prophecy of uncertain utterance, abundantly fulfilled in fact. "Her children arise up, and call her blessed"—children numbered by generations—and to her preeminently, if not solely, amongst women is the title Beata given.

Early pictures of the Madonna, when their origin was unknown, were generally regarded as the work of St. Luke. It is a fanciful legend, but this Evangelist, to use Mrs. Jameson's words, is the true painter of Madonna's portrait. He it is who depicts the beauty of her character—the lowly trustfulness: "Be it unto me according to thy word"; the intellectual power of the Magnificat; the reticence which could keep back and ponder thoughts too deep for song; the ministering that waited upon ministry; the fortitude which endured silently to the end.

It is easy to speak of the cult of Mary as a superstition, or as the creation of tender art; it is not easy to say why her worship preserved itself throughout Christendom for a thousand years; why it found acceptance in the West, as in the East; or what could have taken its place, or equalled its effect, as a civilising, humanising agency, amongst those whom even "the gentleness of Christ" had failed to tame. Newman, in a well-known passage, has told how Madonna's pure eyes, looking down from above the altar, brought a new shame into the world, and rebuked and subdued the passions of lawless men. I find myself wondering whether, but for her, the age of chivalry would ever have dawned, whether the qualifications of the Christian knight would ever have added themselves to the qualities of the Christian soldier. The softer virtues, which Pagan manliness had not the courage to borrow from womankind, were waiting for reconciliation with Christian manhood, and found it here.

There is a vision in the heart of each,
Of justice, mercy, wisdom, tenderness
To wrong and pain, and knowledge of their cure.

Another thing to marvel over is the fact that the one impersonation became the type, both of the domestic and of the ascetic life; that the exultation of La Madonna col Bambino came at once into contrast and into harmony with the stricken sadness of La Madre di Dolore. Before her shrine knelt the white-robed child, and the monk in his habit of black. Yet is the reason perhaps this, that love and sorrow are never far apart, and that one does not deny or exclude the other.

It is singular also that the one type should have adapted itself to various modes of presentation, Italian and Spanish, German and Flemish. It accepted and idealised the features of southern peasant and of northern matron. Was it that the sanctity of motherhood and the divinity of childhood are everywhere alike?

Strangest thing of all was the gradual approach of religious art to common life. The earliest presentation of Mother and Child was a theological symbol. Then came the veneration of the Mother apart from the Child; she was now the Bride, the Queen of Heaven, the Heavenly Wisdom. It is as the Lady of Pity that the Child returns to her arms; but she is still the Madre di Dio, an object of veneration only. Not until art had treated the scenes of her earthly life, and the mother was shown suckling and swaddling her child after the manner of mothers, and this suggestion of domestic life had widened into the grouping of the Holy Family, was contact with human sympathy and human association fully possible. Image-worship apart, and leaving out also the vulgar portraiture under the veil of piety which at one time desecrated both art and religion alike, we may surely say that to religious imagery we owe the highest known type of perfect womanhood. The true image of Mary is not a thing of wood or stone, it is a delineation in the mind, a tender embodiment of feminine grace and virtue. If it be a product of imagination, the power of such imagination is itself a real and helpful possession.

I ask myself whether the old admiration, and almost adoring reverence, for this ideal womanhood is passing away. What will be the ultimate effect on feminine character of surer self-dependence and increasing social freedom? Will there be an eclipse of that lesser light of the world—the refulgence of woman's humble-mindedness, modesty, devotion, patience, reserve? Then will there be need that Christ be born again, that the vision of motherhood and maidenhood in one may be revived. The child in the home teaches much, but there must madonna be—her disciplined purity the complement of unconscious innocence.

Beatam me prædicabunt omnes ætates. Pre-eminently, but not solely. The title "blessed" meets us not once nor twice in the prophetic teaching of her Son. It leads on each Beatitude, and, when the righteous are received into the kindgom prepared for them from the foundation of the world, it is with the greeting, "Come, ye blessed of my Father."

THE HOME AND THE GUEST.

It is the great yearly Homing of Christendom. From school and college and life abroad we gather, joining up the scattered links of family and friendship. Among the comrades, the welcomes, and the gladness there is one guest who must be with us all—the Christ-Spirit, the soul of the sacred season. "To-day," says he, "I must abide at thy house." Let us make ready the guest-chamber, for if we be prepared for him he will not fail. To-day he seeks not the mountain or the tabernacle of the wilderness. We have been with him thither aforetime, and brought back vision and inspiration; but this day he would lodge within our doors. His feet are sunshine on the doorway. His presence makes our dwelling Home.

When we are out in the night, and look up at the sky filled with stars, that great and shining house of God seems a place too large and too magnificent for us. Maybe, it is not really so; but we have not yet stretched our wings. We know not our own height and greatness; and the All-Merciful knows our frailty and suffers us to find a smaller, a simpler, and a warmer tenement—some old soul's cot. Out there in the night the vastness overwhelms us, timid children that we are. Seldom, even in our strongest hours, do we stand unwalled, unroofed to praise the Lord with all the host of heaven. But the Infinite is infinitely tender, and denies us not our simpler refuge, our bivouac of friends, the board on which to divide our daily bread, a corner in which we may hide our sorrow, a little inn whose walls are close enough to echo our laughter. Do the myriad eyes that know not sin seem to question "What is man?" till our spirits answer, "Thou knowest our frame; thou rememberest that we are dust?" But the door of Home opens. Here is our refuge, our covert, our dear den; here in all seasons "Eden weather." Here we need no longer fear being awed by the stupendous creation. Here it is the little which shows its dewlike glory. Here are sparks instead of stars. The stars are cold, but the sparks are warm, and we may chafe one another's hearts till the sparks fly. This is not the realm of the mighty arm, or the titled name, or the crowned brow. Such things are like antique comedies. Home knows no sceptres or preferments or dignities save the sceptre of love and the preferment of selflessness and the sacred dignity of fatherhood and motherhood; and in the ears of its dwellers the roll of fame is but as the wind in the chimney. This is the realm of the busy finger at work on the heart's own edition of life. Hither our thoughts are called in to travel by dutiful inches and not by imperial miles. Here there is no rule by majorities, and the voice of Parliament and the decree of the King come no farther than the threshold. The vagrant whim of an aged, clouded brain is of more weight within this frontier. The microscopic detail of childhood which sets the air alive as with the hum of bees' wings, troubles which weigh no more than shadows, and joys which are as the flight of birds are all great here. A child's voice was heard in a church. It arrested the sermon. The kindly preacher forbade its removal with the remark, "I don't know what the baby was saying, but I know it was all true." O wise man, wise words! There is nothing that belongs to the life of the human family which is too trivial to be beautiful, and what is beautiful is true in the measure of its beauty.

To the Home comes the Christmas Guest. His influence is felt everywhere. Every step is lighter, every face is brighter. If he departs someone shall have seemed to go from every room in the house. Is it that the beloved Guest happens to be out when one enters some houses, for there is no homeliness, no charm of cleanly method, no greater charm of peaceful gladness; but the obtrusion of things, and things talked about which the heart has never sought for, and which have, as it were, to be climbed over with much labour and sometimes ill success in the endeavour to find the hole or corner in which the soul of a man or woman has hidden itself away. But if that Spirit which to-day and every day seeks a place at our fireside be not denied, simplicity and sincerity must prevail.

And he brings peace. The peace of the cloister is not so precious or so sure as the truce of soul which is sealed at the hearth instead of the altar. The song of the kettle is not less sacred than the psalm of the sanctuary. By no door like that whose latch we lift every morning and night can such a world of strife be shut out, and such a world of love be shut in; when that serene Spirit which knows not worry or bitterness has stayed in our midst, helping us to redeem "our chance o' th' prize of learning love," and teaching us how in the simple and the commonplace we may see the Eternal Beauty.

For Eden, Heaven, no need to roam;
The foretaste of it all is home,
Where you and I through this world's weather
Still work and praise and think together.

THE CHARCOAL-BURNERS.

The purer feeling associated with Christmas, which prompts so many thoughts about others and for others, no doubt also prompts the desire to think a little more realistically of Christ and Christ's life and work for a suffering, struggling world, and prompts us to think once more that the healing in his wings was the simple medicine of joy. Get joy, and all else is got. But how to get joy, that miraculous medicine! That is the great religious question. The instinct that points to the right method of attaining this medicine for the ills that mind or heart is heir to is never so wide awake and sensitive as now.

Many and quaint have been the stories and legends by which attempts have been made to instil the central wisdom of Christianity into men's hearts. Here is one, a mediæval legend that befits the Christmas atmosphere, when shortest lessons are probably longest remembered. It is a story of two old peasants, charcoal-burners, of their witless son, and of their only friend, a large, rough, wooden image of the crucifix, a gaunt and dreary Christ upon a bleak and barren hill. This Christ hung below a beacon, which it was the task, each night, of the charcoal-burners to keep kindled, and it was set at the meeting of the ways, just where these ways opened on a deadly pass; and travellers, passing through this bleak and dangerous country, were wont to stop at its feet and pray, to entreat from the suffering Christ some help. The interest, pathos, and tragedy of the legend is centred in the poor witless lad and his strange and increasing pity for the gaunt and lonely Christ as he hangs there helplessly on the bleak hill. From brooding on the story of the crucifix and the meaning of that death on the cross, the lad had come gradually to imagine that it was an actual man suffering there on the cross. And on a winter night of more than usual severity his heart bled for the added sufferings of the Christ; he yearned to go and help him, to draw out the cruel nails from hands and feet, and do something for him. He stole away with that object, and was so long away that the peasants grew uneasy, and believed that some mishap had befallen the lad. Presently, however, to their amazement he came back to them bearing upon his shoulders a wounded Christ of flesh and blood. They all tenderly set to work and laid him upon the hearth before the warm fire of the kitchen, and he was slowly nursed back to life. He thereupon rose, gave them his blessing, and departed, taking with him their poor witless son, so simple, yet so full of love and pity and desire to help.

The poor, simple-minded, simple-hearted creature had become absorbed with one thought, which had transformed him into a ministering angel. How could he help that suffering creature, that Suffering Christ? The travellers, as they began to descend the awful mountain pass, looked up to the suffering figure for help, knelt to him for help. That seemed strange to the witless lad. It seemed more fitting to try and help the suffering Christ. And so at last, on that cold winter's night, he drew the nails from hands and feet and bore him home to his own hearth.

The story tells its own simple lesson—that it is unavailing to plead to a dead Christ. We must first make him living, and then he will uplift us and save us. But even more it seems to tell us that the way to make Christ a living influence is to think less of seeking help from him than of rendering some help to him: to think less of what we claim from others and more of what we can do for others. The story enshrines in its own quaint way the central wisdom of Christianity—that joy gives us fullest life, and that to be absorbed in rendering help, and not seeking it, paves the way to the joy we seek. When we have been caring for others we find ourselves carried out of ourselves; we are uplifted at the very time that we are trying to uplift others. Perhaps at certain great passes and crises of life we should find our path more secure and the dangers less terrifying if we expected less from others and sought to do more for others. The simplest Christian wisdom seems to dictate merely one thing, and it is the immortal one thing needful—to try and think how we can help Christ—not, of course, in the sense of the charcoal-burners' witless son, though that has its beautiful and pathetic side, but how we can help Christ to help others, how we can take him into our own warm hearts and cherish him from being a mere wooden, lifeless figure, ensample, or warning, into a living, loving influence, powerful to carry us upwards on his wings, so that we, too, can say, "If we are raised together with Christ, let us seek the things that are above." The golden key to the problem of our human destiny is the finding somewhere, somehow, some time, the healing in the wings of the Dayspring from on high, the medicine of joy, and the fulfilment of the glorious prophecy, "Everlasting joy shall be upon their heads; they shall obtain gladness and joy, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away."

Christmas, 1904.

AT the times when you cannot see God, there is still open to you this sacred possibility, to show God.—G. S. Merriam

GALILEE AND THE NATURAL THEOLOGY OF JESUS.

THE interest of a sojourn in Palestine still centres in Galilee. It is a wearying journey from Jerusalem to Nazareth, and Safed, and Tiberias, and Chorazin; but it is worth while. We (two friends) spent many days in those Northern regions in the spring of 1901; and memories of some of its scenes, and the impressions they produced, linger yet in the mind; and, at times, thoughts of the intimate relation between the outward features of the land and the sayings and the life of its greatest prophet become strangely vivid, and as if more clear with the lapse of time.

From the summit of a hill that rises westward above the town of Nazareth, that Northern region of Palestine lies well in view on every side. I stood there alone on a clear bright Sunday morning in spring, and the remembrance of that scene has not fade daway! Below one, looking south and west, there is the great plain of Esdraelon, which cuts right through the land of hills, from the sea to the low cliffs above the Jordan valley. Due south, beyond the plain, lie the hills of Samaria over which we had come so wearily. Due west, there is the rounded summit and bold headland of Mount Carmel, and I think I saw the glimmer of the distant sea, between Haifa and Acre. Northwards the rugged outlines of the Galilean hills reach away towards Lebanon, and in the far north-east the great mass of Hermon, with snow on its higher ridges, gleams in the clear sunshine, fifty miles away. Eastward, past Mount Tabor, is the long irregular range of hills "beyond Jordan"—Bashan, the Jaulan, and Gilead. Standing there, one thinks how often on this wide and wonderful scene Jesus must have gazed. From boyhood to thirty years of age, such was the environment of his home.

Descending from Nazareth to the shores of the Lake of Tiberias, the natural features of the landscape unfold themselves to the modern traveller, as of old to the prophet of that upland town, who sought in the populous cities of the plain a larger, freer scope for his ministry. Except where man has wrought destruction, nature presents in this low-lying, sub-tropical region, an extraordinary scene of fertility, and wildness, and beauty. Even to-day, and to pilgrims from the West, depressed by the close, heavy atmosphere, and bothered by the difficulties that pertain to unaccustomed ways of life in a strange land, the charm of the lake and its lonely shores and enclosing hills, and the luxuriant growths that clothe some of the lower slopes of the hills and the level plains between them, is very great. But, in the time of Jesus, many parts of Galilee, and especially the plain of Gennesaret, must have been still more beautiful, because more fertile than now.

Desolating wars and Turkish rule have wrought their evil work, not only on the human inhabitants, but on the face of nature herself. The grandeur of the hills, the bright waters and lovely outline of the lake, the radiance of the spring flowers, they could not injure. But the luxuriance of the plains, the freshness and beauty of gardens and orchards and fields of growing corn, the waster has done much to destroy or devastate. The poetry of the "Song of Solomon" (supposing they are right who think its author was a Galilean), the descriptions of Josephus, the references to Galilee in Tacitus, Pliny, and Strabo, bear witness to the extraordinary loveliness and fertility of the land. Many parts that are now barren and desolate must have then been covered with woods and orchards or fruitful fields.

Dr. Merrill, the U.S. Consul in Jerusalem, writing of the Galilee of ancient times, says, "Here in this garden that has no end, flourished the vine, the olive, and the fig; the oak, the walnut, the terebinth, and the hot-blooded palm; the cedar, cypress, and balsam; the fir-tree, the pine, and the sycamore; the bay-tree, the myrtle, the almond, the pomegranate, the citron, and the beautiful oleander.

"Forests in many cases covered its mountains and hills, while its uplands, gentle slopes, and broader valleys were rich in pastures, cultivated fields, vineyards, olive-grooves, and fruit-trees of every kind."*

When we read the sayings and the nature-parables of Jesus it is well to have in mind some remembrance of the wealth, in beauty and fruitfulness, of the land in which he dwelt. Some writer on Palestine has said that, "If nature could influence mind, if it could create genius, Naphtali would be the land of poets." Some of us have no doubt at all that nature can and does "influence mind"; and if she cannot "create genius," she can do much to foster it. And once, at least, Naphtali was the home of a poet, who was also a prophet, and perhaps, also, the most wonderful religious genius our world has known. That the outward scenes amid which he moved influenced the thoughts and emotions of his heart we cannot doubt. We may not pretend to understand the mystery of genius, least of all, of religious genius. "The spirit bloweth where it listeth." The life of the soul is secret, deep, and strange. But we may think of that beautiful land, those hills of Nazareth, the fertile slopes and plains below, the fruitful trees, the bright and varied flowers, the cool clear streams, the great calm mountains far away, the lake and its lovely shores, and over all those depths of Syrian sky. And then we may think of a boy gifted with an open, thoughtful mind, a pure, gentle and affectionate heart, working at his trade, learning the strange history of his people, reading the sacred books, listening to the teachers of his time—but growing up amid these marvellous things of nature, seeing the abundance of her gifts, feeling the beauty of her scenes, and musing on the life of men and the movements of his own spirit. And as we think of these things—the sweet, innocent, thoughtful youth, the fair and fertile landscape—we can, in some degree, imagine how, silently and slowly, through the years that led on to manhood, there grew within him a deep strong faith in a Spirit of goodness and beauty and love. The Power which lives and works in all these fruits of the earth, in all these glories of mountain, lake, and stream, and sky—the Power of whose greatness and wisdom Israel's psalmists and prophets had written in olden days, became, to the gentle and quiet heart of Jesus, a Presence and a Life in which he and all men might surely trust and calmly hope. We conceive him moving there amid those scenes as one consciously sustained and possessed by an invisible creative Spirit—a Spirit that loved him, that loved all men, and was never absent from the life or death of any creature which its silent energy had formed. And we may realise thus, at least in part, the significance of that spiritual movement in the life of the young Galilean carpenter, which was to affect, so profoundly, the courses of history and the thoughts of men—may come to know what that restful and reverent faith of Jesus really was, and perchance may reach unto some vital fellowship with him, in that serenity and peacefulness of heart which was so largely the secret of his strength and the source of his courage and his hope.

And when, in the fulness of his powers, and moved by a resistless impulse of love, he comes forth as a teacher of men, and speaks to them in such calm, spontaneous, almost familiar language of his "Father," we may have some true conception of what, upon his lips, that word really meant. It meant that, in his innocent, confiding soul, all doubts were laid to rest; it meant that he could entirely trust the Power which formed this beautiful world, and placed its human child there, to be fed by its bounty and blessed by its loveliness and grace; it meant that he loved that Power, and was happy in its presence and its care, and desired only to obey its voice, speaking in his own heart, and sending him forth to do its sacred will; it meant that he felt himself to be at one with God, at home in the great household of life which His Spirit filled—that he could live in communion and in peace with God, as a child with the father or mother, whose kindness was no longer questioned, whose power was no longer feared, whose wisdom and goodness might be trusted to the uttermost, and whose commands should be gladly and promptly obeyed. How fresh and spontaneous from his lips would come such words as "My Father is greater than I," "I and my Father are one," "My meat is to do the will of Him that sent me and to continue His work"; "One is your Father who is in heaven, and all ye are brethren"; "Not a sparrow falls to the ground without your Father, but the very hairs of your head are numbered; fear not therefore, ye are of more value than many sparrows."

Such is the "natural theology" of Jesus—meaning by theology not a formal creed or theory of God, but a conception of man's relation to the unseen—an attitude of mind and heart towards the Mystery of the world's creative and sustaining Power; and by natural theology, the conception which may form itself in the human soul, independently of tradition and established beliefs—the faith of the reason and the heart, when subject to the free play of the influences of actual life, in presence of the loveliness and bountifulness of the actual world.

The ideal religious faith of Jesus is expressed in those utterances which belong to the earlier months of his ministry, before the hostility of the formalists and priests met him and darkened all the ways of life. It is of this early period that I am thinking now. In a land of which it has been said that the climate and scenery are the "nearest approach to perpetual spring," a pure and gentle and thoughtful spirit attained to this attitude of serene trust and resignation, in relation to the Unseen Power by which life is. This may not carry conviction to our own minds as to the vital significance of such attitude; it may not go far to meet the doubts or solve the problems of serious and devout thinkers to-day. To recall these things may not render it more possible for us to enter into that peace of heart which Jesus knew, or into that passion of sympathy with things human and divine which made him so heroic, alike in faith and love, alike in resignation and in service. Yet we shall not dismiss them lightly. And there are times when, in face of all that seems to conflict with his happy confidence in the wise graciousness of That Which rules the Universe, we feel that he could not have been mistaken or deceived. The insight of one endowed and circumstanced as this beautiful prophet was must have reached far into the heart of things. Much has been revealed since his time. Many facts of life and the world, of which he knew nothing, are taught in every school in Europe to-day. But these things belong, for the most part, to the "Religion of Time"; they are concerned with the world of "Appearance" and the life of change and progress. But the "Religion of Eternity," the faith of man in relation to the Unchanging Reality of things—may not this Seer and Lover be nearer to that than we often are? This modern world, with its strain and conflict, its eagerness to master nature and improve her methods, its fret and fuming over the mere ownership of what can be seen and touched, has doubtless achieved wondrously in the realm of knowledge and artifice, and even art. Yet concerning the great Life and Reality of things it may have much to learn of one who, while mingling freely with men and profoundly caring for them, could, under those Syrian skies, and among the hills at night, be alone with the silence and mystery of God. In the slow calm life of the East, with few physical needs, it may have been more possible for the human spirit to know that long and intimate communion with the Reality which hides within all appearance, and to see the truth which busier souls see not. To one who was at home in that land—to whom the climate and surroundings were native and not oppressive, the profoundest reveries of thought might come, and the vision be granted wherein truth would be discerned as by an intense gaze, and the "Light Eternal full of Love" be clearly seen. And so one feels that the mind of Jesus, unfolding there in innocence and simplicity, amid scenes of beauty and peace, may have found that which the clever, busy intellects of a different age and clime can so easily miss, or fail to grasp, without his aid.

And our confidence in the truth and depth of his inspiration is made more strong when we remember that he who found this faith of quiet trust and filial love, in times of peace and happiness, did not lose it in the days of darkness and defeat and sorrow. For he who said so joyously in the early time, "I must be about my Father's business," "Be not anxious for your life," "Consider the lilies how they grow," said also, in the hour of betrayal, "Ye shall leave me alone, and yet I am not alone, because the Father is with me"; said also, when they were nailing him to the cross, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do," said, indeed, in the moment of awful physical agony, "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me"; yet with the last breath of exhausted nature, said, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit."

This, surely, is religion; this is the very life and heart of religion, and this may still be the simple yet profound faith of the soul which meets the dark and the bright realities of experience calmly, reverently, and with dauntless resignation of will.

CHRISTMAS, 1904.

"THE Prince of Peace is born to-day!"
Our carols loud proclaim;
While myriad voices lowly pray
In his belovèd name.
And Christmas song and Christmas cheer,
And children's happy mirth,
In every land with accents clear
Salute Messiah's birth.

"The Prince of Peace!" yet lo! afar
The shuddering earth records
Not Angels' song nor Magi's star,
But clash of vengeful swords.
The smoke of cannon, reek of blood,
And groans of dying men,
Mid icy blast and frozen flood,
Scoff at the Christ again!

Fierce armies stand with flags unfurled
And challenge loud they fling;
"Not Christ, but Mammon, rules the world!
Not Love, but Hate is King!"
Dumb, driven peasants on the sod
Gasp out the breath of life;
While Christian Priests call on their God
To bless th' unholy strife!

Shame on the nineteen hundred years
That leave us beasts of prey!
Shame on the Church of Christ that stirs
The fury of the fray!
Shame on the nations that are built
On force and murderous war,
And mock by prayers that brand their guilt
The Saviour they adore!

Meek Prince of Peace! appear again
In hearts of love and truth!
Once more be heard th' angelic strain
That tells of heavenly ruth!
If all unheard by men of might
Mid warfare's turmoil drear,
Let shepherds keeping watch by night
The blessèd greeting hear.

WERE not our humanity itself an Emmanuel, there could be no Christ to bear the name.—Martineau.

The December Cornhill has an article by Mr. E. V. Lucas on "Charles Lamb's Commonplace Books," and in the Provincial Letter, Urbanus Sylvan tells of "A Holiday in Wensleydale."

SIR JOHN ROBINSON'S MEMOIRS.*

It is the chief defect of this attractive book of gossip, and sometimes more valuable historical material, that it ought to have been simply "Sir John Robinson's Memoirs," but is not. The amount of "compiling and editing" that has been given to the original matter is conjecturally considerable; for the compiler and editor, Mr. F. Moy Thomas, admits that his own "recollections," during nearly a quarter of a century's acquaintanceship with Sir John, have furnished materials for this book. To anyone who has no special personal interest in the celebrated journalist's life and character the volume will doubtless come in welcome hour—at least if the reader's object is to while away the time with good stories about men and women of note; and, if he is content occasionally to be patient with patches of pleasantry about things and people of no importance whatever, his end will be well served.

But the wide circle of Sir John Robinson's friends can hardly be satisfied with so indeterminate a reflex of his mind and temper. The mere record of events in such a career as his is of comparatively small interest; and in any case they were sufficiently well known to most who knew him at all. Born in a little Essex town (Witham), the son of a Congregational minister; apprenticed to a bookseller and printer at Shepton Mallet, Somerset; reporter and sub-editor at Bedford, afterwards in London on THE INQUIRER and other journals, and finally connected with the Daily News, of which he was manager and subsequently editor during a very long period—such are the chief notes of his personal history. Mr. Thomas might well shrink from the attempt to make much of such a simple story; and all who knew Sir John must be quite sure that he of all men would not wish such an attempt to be made.

But what we who knew him wanted was a fuller insight into the moods and judgments of one whose shrewdness, urbanity, and rich warmth of feeling were as evident as his intercourse with public men and his share in moulding public opinion were far beyond what falls to ordinary people. He had taken pains to record his opinions, and to preserve copious notes of what he had seen and heard. In his later years it was not unusual for him in conversation to refer to his memoranda in the tone of one who, with a half-century's experience of high-class journalism to guide him, considered them likely to be valued as a contribution to the history of the inner side of politics in his day. His own view was certainly that the most important parts of his memoranda could not be published for some time; and we cannot believe that the present date would have received his sanction as appropriate.

Of course, a rejoinder may be made either that Sir John, like some of his predecessors in literature, over-estimated the significance of his work, or that, all things considered, it was better, even at some sacrifice of special passages, to make a marketable book at once than to defer indefinitely the complete publication. Be the explanation what it may, we are left in a dubious mood. Whole pages and almost chapters occur in which no distinct indication of the writer's personality is given; in fact, we do not know whose material confronts us, Sir John's or his Editor's. The latter handsomely says he himself may be debited with any dulness in the book, while Sir John shall have credit for its brilliance. All very well; but we who care more, after all, for a man than for a joke or an anecdote, would prefer to have our friend, dulness and all, unadulterated.

Our growl being over, though our chagrin must remain, it is only fair to repeat that in addition to telling the story of the Daily News (that was), the volume abounds in interesting incidents. "Good stories" are given by the score, and excellent thumb-nail sketches are here of statesmen, orators, writers, divines, actors, musicians, royal personages, and others who were prominent in the life of the latter half of the nineteenth century. The mere list of the celebrities referred to would take up an unreasonable space, and if (for that vexing doubt will obtrude) Sir John knew them all, or nearly all, his round of personal acquaintance must have been enormous. Probably, however, in addition to the present Editor's matter, there were preserved in the original memoranda records of tales heard as well as of events witnessed, such as the experienced journalist keeps in store.

There is, of course, a special interest in Sir John Robinson's references here and there to Unitarians. Although he was content to remain behind the front rank in their public functions, he was none the less a sincere adherent of the faith—his introduction to which was due to the Rev. Henry Solly; and glimpses are given here of several old worthies. He found reason for a good humoured chuckle in what he gathered to be Lord Beaconsfield's private opinion of the orthodoxy which in the person of the bishops that politician so zealously supported. What share the Jewish ancestry and the Unitarian school, which Disraeli attended as a boy, respectively had in stamping his mind in regard to these things must be left to conjecture.

We must not proceed to quote. If the reader can get the book from the library or afford himself a modest Christmas-box he may assure himself of many a smile, and perhaps something broader, as he reads these easily-read pages. They preserve the memory of a good and able man, and if the mental portrait is blurred somewhat, the frontispiece is a capital likeness. It is seasonable—why not always so?—to reflect that one who was so much behind the scenes, who saw and heard men in their unguarded and most self-revealing moments, evidently regarded his fellows without cynicism, without despair. His comments may be keen, but they are never bitter; and nothing was more abhorrent to his mind than the tendency to make "good copy" at the expense of other people's reputation. He was himself a workman in his craft needing not to be ashamed; and on the whole he seems not to have been ashamed of humankind at large.

WITH a word by way of caution that the volume before us must be read in the perspective afforded by independent acquaintance with her books, we commend this biography of Edna Lyall to all who desire further knowledge of the circumstances and events in and through which she became what she was. Hers was eminently the kind of influence in literature we associate with such metaphors as "sweet, wholesome, vitalising." The literary expert may pull us up short in mid-career of praise, with indications of "impossible" forms; even humdrum daily experience may affirm the inadequacy of such solvent to the complexities of life's puzzlements.

But howsoever the letter may kill and be killed, here is witness of the present spirit giving life. Surely this is that we need above all things in current literature of the sort called "popular"—the water of life held out to thirsty souls, accrediting the veriest gourd consecrated to the office of a goblet.

But the literary form of Edna Lyall was no rude goblet. Neither as personality, philosopher, nor artist can we think of her in terms we should use perforce of George Eliot or Charlotte Brontë. Yet her style was characterised by grace, force, vitality, and humour. It had a certain charm of directness and lucidity, together with that tenderness and sympathetic insight with which womanhood, speaking from the heart, qualifies all utterance. In her "public" she would probably be best classified as a writer of "girls' books." Would that there were more such, that one might need no apology for the seeming slight of the phrase.

Miss Escreet has given us a pleasing portraiture. It is scarcely Edna Lyall; but we may accept it as Edna Lyall so far as it goes; and for the rest a picture of real value for its grace and graciousness. The background is sufficiently sketched in, and the usual indispensable data of times and places are carefully tabulated. Brief appreciations by other friends make an interesting appendix.

The book is a labour of love; and sufficiently condoned are its shortcomings in the thought, "She hath done what she could." It would be unjust to the authoress to say less; to say more would scarcely be just to the memory of her subject. We possess no better portrait; and we thank Miss Escreet for this.

The Golden Windows: a Book of Fables for Young and Old, by Laura E. Richards, author of "Captain January," "Joyous Story of Toto," &c., is an American book, of which an English edition is most welcome. The fables are all quite short, and, though all printed together, some are distinctly only for the elders, while others for the children are very charming. Whoever reads "The Pig Brother" will want to get the book: "The Golden Windows," "To-morrow," and "The Coming of the King" are also among the best. (Allenson. 2s. 6d. net.)

CORRESPONDENCE.

SUGAR.

SIR,—I am very grateful for Mr. Frank Preston's letter to you dated December 14, but should have been more so had chapter and verse been given for that quotation from Mr. Gladstone, viz.: "unfair and entirely inconsistent with free trade." Along with Mr. Preston I recognise the authority of Mr. Gladstone, but I do not recognise the occasion from which the remark is quoted. Could you perhaps enlighten me?

It is consoling to have Mr. Preston's word for it that "now for the first time for about thirty years there is practically Free Trade in Sugar." Other people seem to believe, that at present we in the United Kingdom are paying a duty upon sugar, and also, that imports of sugar from Russia and Argentine are, by the Brussels Convention, excluded. So perhaps the Free Trade he refers to is elsewhere than in the United Kingdom.

A CORRECTION.

SIR,—An unfortunate mistake has got into the new Essex Hall Directory. It is there stated that our old chapel at Bradwell is closed. I am glad to say the chapel is not and has not been closed; that, on the contrary, it is very much open and alive. Under its devoted honorary lay pastor, Mr. C. A. Smith, it is doing as good work and attracting as large congregations as at any time during the 20 years I have known it—congregations which would be considered good in towns many times the size of this Derbyshire village.

CHARLES PEACH.

COMMON-SENSE PHILOSOPHY.

SIR,—The "Conflict of Philosophies," referred to in your last number by Prof. Upton, is of more than usual interest to us "men-in-the-street." We seem to-day to be threatened with a revolution in Philosophy no less profound than the revolution effected by Darwinism in Zoology, and the battle is likely to be keener, as the service done to mankind bids to be greater.

As one might expect, the new philosophy is closely connected with the Darwinian revolution, and indeed seems to be its topical development within the realms of psychology. Every organism, says the Darwinian, puts forth its energy in its own peculiar way, experimentally, and its objective environment either encourages this peculiarity (even unto thousands of generations) or discourages it with the penalty of extermination. So, says "Humanism," our conceptions of our environment, or truth, are mental energies that either still are, or once were, experimental. The idea of an outside world for instance has been elaborated,* corrected, and tested by practical use for countless generations, and its wonderful adaptation to the objective realities (whatever they may be, or "not be") is so practically valuable that we can no more go back upon it now, than we can decide to adopt compound eyes as preferable to the vertebrate variety. We are, in fact, committed by our line of descent to certain fundamental ways of thinking, as of digesting and reproducing.

Our conception of "time," for instance, has many and obvious defects, which the voyager into higher realms of thought and feeling is continually being hampered by. It is vain, however, to lament the inevitable past—for though it may be true that the dim consciousness of our palæozoic ancestry might conceivably have happened on a line of "time-conception" that should prove in its latest development still more broadly serviceable to us than the one we actually have—yet as a matter of fact it did not, and perhaps could not, have done.

All we know is that that germinal conception of "time" (whatever it was like), matured into our present conception because of the objective facts which it had to deal with and which conditioned it, and that it has been improved and extended all along the line at the venture of individual and specific life. The organism which had not some explanation of change and "flux" could not advance at all; that one which had the best (that is, best of those on the field) must, other things being equal, predominate.

But all this, say the humanists, does not limit the future. We are vertebrates, for good or for ill, both physically and mentally. But there are important varieties amongst vertebrates and even amongst civilised men and philosophers. And we have yet to decide, by processes as stern as that of natural selection in the physical world, what shall be the future character of our outlook upon life. The developments now open to us, though necessarily of smaller extent, are of continually increasing consequence—just as the difference between a lobster and a frog may be greater in extent but is certainly less in consequence than the difference between a frog and a man or chimpanzee. And these higher developments of faith and attitude towards life, though capable in their initial stages of being spread by eclectic discussion and propagandism rather than mere organic propagation, must ultimately make their appeal to objective facts, as truly as the tentative organic or psychic developments of our forbears, and at the same great venture of life itself. Our beliefs indeed are still largely experimental, some of our most important beliefs almost entirely so—and the religious question for every man to-day, whether he aspires merely to guide his own life aright or to help the advance of humanity, is something like this:—"Is my belief in the truth of this doctrine (the fundamental justice of the universe or what not) so rooted in my nature that I am willing, nay obliged, gladly and even exultantly to stake my own life and hopes, and those of such as I can influence, by living as though it were true?" But even so, the answer of the universe is sometimes strangely ambiguous and mysterious, and cannot be read by a single life. Jesus in living out his faith wrecked his own young life and probably saved the Western world.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Bootle.—At the Free Church, Stanley-road, a performance of the Messiah was rendered on Sunday afternoon by a combined choir and orchestra of 80 performers, drawn from several neighbouring orthodox churches. Three of the soloists were from Myrtle-street Baptist Church, St. Michael's, Liverpool, and St. Nicholas', Blundellsands, respectively. Mr. Th. Rimmer, organist of the Myrtle-street Church, presided at the organ, and Mr. A. H. Jefferies, organist and choirmaster at the Free Church, conducted. The performance throughout was admirable. At the evening service special music was also rendered, and an appropriate address delivered by the minister—Rev. J. Morley Mills—on "The Music of Orphans and the Song of the Angels." On both occasions the congregations were good.

Edinburgh.—An interesting course of lectures, in which several representatives of different forms of faith took part, was brought to a close at St. Mark's Chapel on Sunday evening, December 11. The pulpit of the chapel had been offered as a free platform to one minister of the Church of Scotland, Dr. Glasse, who accepted the invitation, to three ministers, in succession, of the United Free Church, to two Congregationalists, one Baptist, two Episcopal clergymen, one Roman Catholic priest, and the Jewish Rabbi, all of whom, however, for various reasons, declined, but not without in many cases expressing their appreciation of the liberality of the offer. The course of lectures as finally arranged was the following:—"The Sympathy of Religions": Rev. R. B. Drummond. "Spiritual Independence in Theory and in Fact": Rev. Felix Taylor. "Social Regeneration and City Environment": Professor Patrick Geddes. "The Swedenborgian Faith": Rev. Charles A. Hall. "Unitarianism": Rev. James Forrest. "John Knox and Scottish Presbyterianism": Rev. John Glasse, D.D. "Theosophy": Mr. G. R. S. Mead. Rev. R. A. Armstrong was to have lectured on "The Permanent in Religion," but as he was prevented by illness from fulfilling his engagement, the concluding lecture was given by Rev. R. B. Drummond. The lectures were attended by large congregations.

Evesham (Appointment).—The Rev. G. Leonard Phelps has accepted the unanimous invitation of the Oat-street congregation to fill the pulpit recently vacated by the Rev. Rudolf Davis. Mr. Phelps was recently minister at Devonport. He enters on his new charge with the New Year.

Horsham.—The congregation of the Free Christian Church mourns the loss of Miss Ida Nailard, who passed peacefully away on Friday, Dec. 16, at the residence of her parents. Heavily handicapped all through her life by physical infirmity, her brave and cheerful spirit remained unbroken to the end. For thirteen years, as a wreath laid upon her grave bore witness, she was the "wise and careful treasurer" of the Band of Mercy; some of her happiest hours were spent with a Sunday-school class, who, with her fellow-teachers, laid similar affectionate tributes on her grave.

Kidderminster (Appointment).—The Rev. J. E. Stronge, of Kilburn, has accepted a unanimous invitation to the pulpit of the New Meeting, in succession to the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans, now of Bury.

Knutsford.—The December Calendar contains a list of members who have promised donations amounting to £388 2s. towards the Jubilee Memorial Fund of the Unitarian Home Missionary College. It also refers to the East Cheshire Christian Union Bazaar, recently held, towards which the Knutsford congregation contributed £120.

Liverpool.—The Rev. H. W. Hawkes, having declined to voluntarily pay the rate levied for the Waterloo sectarian schools, was distrained upon, a gold watch being taken. This was sold for the amount of rate and 12s. 6d. costs, the auctioneer (a Unitarian) taking no remuneration as a mark of sympathy.

London: Highgate (Appointment).—The Rev. Addison A. Charlesworth, late of New Hall Hill Chapel, Birmingham, has accepted the unanimous invitation of the members to the pastorate of the Highgate Unitarian Christian Church.

London: Kilburn (Resignation).—The Rev. J. E. Stronge has resigned the pulpit of the Quex-road Church after a ministry of ten years, having accepted an invitation to Kidderminster.

London: Portland-street.—On Saturday last, Dec. 17, the Christmas Party was held at the Portland Institute, Little Titchfield-street, W. During the course of the evening, Mr. T. Bagley, assistant-superintendent, presented the Rev. H. S. Perris, who is retiring from the superintendency after five years' service, with a number of volumes, on behalf of the members of the Social Club, which was founded by Mr. Perris. The books were inscribed as "a token of appreciation and affection from the members."

Newport, Isle of Wight.—On Wednesday, December 7, a two days' sale of work in aid of the funds of the Unitarian Christian Church was opened in the schoolroom adjoining the church by Mrs. Leslie Chatfeild-Clarke. The sale was completely successful. Not only was the sum raised larger than had been anticipated, but the work for a common object fostered a spirit of unity and cordial agreement. A most gratifying result was the help received from members of other denominations. Members of the Church of England, Methodists, and Congregationalists were present, and proved how false was the statement that they would not attend a Unitarian sale of work. The proceeds of the sale, without including a number of subscriptions, amounted to more than £50.

Scarborough.—On Peace Sunday Mr. Joshua Rowntree, formerly member of Parliament for the borough, preached in the Westborough Unitarian Church, at the evening service, which was conducted by the Rev. O. Binns. Mr. Rowntree took for his subject "The Song of the Sword," and for text Gen. iv. 23, 24. Had we yet, he asked, got beyond the conditions pictured in that ancient "Song of the Sword." Surely we were called by the very elementary understanding of justice between man and man, life and life, to something better than this old call out from the darkness of vaunting and revenge. Might we not ask that men should recognise moral responsibilities to one another, and advance to the recognition of these responsibilities between community and community, nation and nation? The anthem, "How lovely are the messengers," was sung, and the service throughout was of a most impressive and helpful character.

Torquay.—A highly successful series of lectures and concerts has been held in Unity Hall during the autumn session. Lectures were given on "Handicraftsmen," "Ferns and Mosses: How they Grow," "The Human Telegraph System," and "A First Visit to Ireland," and the public showed their appreciation by attending in increasing numbers. The concerts were of the same high-class character as hitherto.

Walthamstow.—A sale of work, organised by the Church Aid Society, was held on Wednesday and Thursday, December 7 and 8, to raise a sum in aid of the building fund. The iron structure erected seven years ago through the efforts of the Rev. Robert Spears is now in need of considerable repair which would entail a large expense, and in view of this fact the congregation have considered the advisability of endeavouring to secure a permanent building of some kind. Mr. John Harrison, who was to have opened the sale, was prevented by the weather and the state of his health from being present. The Rev. W. H. Rose, the minister, officiated. A resolution of sympathy with Mr. Harrison, moved by Mrs. Salt, seconded by Mr. H. G. Ball, and supported by the Rev. H. W. Perris, was unanimously passed. The second day's proceedings were opened by Mr. W. H. Withall, of Highgate, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant presiding. The Rev. T. E. M. Edwards was also present. The various stalls, which were tastefully arranged, were well patronised each day by a fairly good number of friends, among whom were several from Highgate, Stepney, Stratford, and Forest Gate. The result was considered very satisfactory.

To CORRESPONDENTS:—Letters, &c.; received from G. A. A.; H. B. B.; J. E. C.; C. H.; J. H.; P. V.; H.; R. J. J.; W. K.; S. H.; M.; J. R.; J. T.; C. B. U.; S. W.

All the great principles of morals and religion may be illustrated and confirmed, like the great laws of nature, by what falls under the child's own consciousness and experience. Indeed, great moral and religious truths are nearer to him than the principles of natural science. The germs of them are in the soul. All the elementary ideas of God and duty and love and happiness come to him from his own spiritual powers and affections. Moral good and evil, virtue and vice, are revealed to him in his own motives of action, and in the motives of those around him. Faith in God and virtue does not depend on assertion alone. Religion carries its own evidence with it more than history or science. It should rest more on the soul's own consciousness, experience, and observation. To wake up the soul to a clear, affectionate perception of the reality and truth and greatness of religion, is the great end of teaching.—Channing.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

ON the eve of a New Year silent wishes go forth from friend to friend, and silent prayers for renewed consecration and strength for better service.

THE keen and widespread distress resulting from the aggravated condition of unemployment which it required no special insight to forecast some months ago, is at last striking the imagination of the benevolent. Something has been done for the London unemployed by the committee inaugurated by Mr. Long, but what is being attempted is sadly small as compared with what is needed. And the evil effect of treating as a London question what in reality is of national significance is strikingly illustrated in the case of West Ham. This huge, and at all times poor, population is for social purposes a part of London, and is at the present one of the most distressed districts. But, officially, it is not London, and the London scheme does not apply to it. Some of the London daily papers have made known the suffering existing there, and large subscription lists are the response—over £5,000 in one case, 188,148 shillings (£9,407) in another, up to Thursday morning.

THIS money is for immediate relief, for food and firing. All possible precautions are being taken to ensure that the funds shall benefit the right people. Be the precautions what they may, it will be pointed out that emergency relief funds are not good things. Certainly they are not good, but biting hunger and cold despair are worse. And we may not complain of this rough-and-ready remedy until as a nation we are prepared to prevent the horrors of industrial distress. Had the people, acting through its Parliament, only taken the matter in hand last month! But it did nothing of the kind, apparently did not care enough. In lack of more thorough measures, we can only record with thankfulness the partial relief afforded by the Daily News and the Daily Telegraph.

A SCHEME for co-operation between the Poor Law Guardians and philanthropic individuals which leapt into popularity a generation ago, and which has been the means of some useful work in the interval, is now languishing because philanthropic energy has grown languid or has reached its highest limit. We refer to the system of boarding out orphan and deserted children in cottage homes under peasant foster parents. They are admittedly superior homes to the large poor law schools. But they are only good under proper supervision. This work of oversight has to be done in the first place by volunteers, and it is very largely woman's work. It is proving more and more impossible to obtain the services of suitable women to form the needed committees, and for want of them the system is unduly checked.

MISS MASON, the senior inspector of boarding out under the Local Government Board, has repeatedly drawn attention to this, and in her last report she writes: "I must continue to repeat that the real reason for the non-extension of the boarding out system is the insufficiency of the supply of good committees, homes, and foster parents." There are still districts where suitable homes and foster parents may be found. And surely there must be women possessed of leisure and willing to do this work. Possibly some of our readers may be disposed in this way to serve these unfortunate little ones. The homes are wanted in country districts; the children would come from the crowded town centres.

IN Manchester a great amount of attention has been given to the problem of the unemployed, and a scheme was brought forward before a conference at the Town Hall on Saturday week by Mr. Arthur Smith, chairman of the Unemployed Committee, the general lines of which were accepted, and a resolution moved by the Lord Mayor was passed asking the Government to bring forward a Bill immediately dealing with the unemployed in the manner suggested. It is proposed that labour bureaus should be established in every industrial centre, and that the committee of the bureau should be responsible to its council for the feeding, clothing, and housing of all employable persons and their dependents. The principle is accepted that a person who cannot obtain work is a just charge upon society; that the administration must be local; that acceptance of help from the labour bureau shall not involve disfranchisement; that those who desire employment shall register their names, and the giving of false data shall be a criminal offence; and that the labour bureau committee shall hand over to the Boards of Guardians the care of those who cannot be classed as employable.

THERE would be for each bureau a manager, and an organisation of all the beaureaus in connection with each other. So far as possible work would be found in the ordinary channels. The remaining surplus labour would be used under national supervision in such works as afforestation, draining marshes, levelling ground, diverting rivers, reclaiming foreshores, draining, &c.—such beneficial enterprises as do not compete with ordinary trades and commercial undertakings. Each person under the protection of the labour bureau would be registered, and receive a card giving his number, date of signing on, trade, &c., and on his obtaining employment this card would be returned to the bureau. Until employment was found relief would be granted at such a rate as to prevent starvation, but not to tempt a man to avoid work. The expense should be borne half from imperial and half from local taxation. The details were explained and discussed. It was recognised by many that the scheme would inevitably lead to the establishment of labour colonies. A Free Trade Hall meeting is to be held at an early date, with the Lord Mayor in the chair, to bring the matter before the general public.

THE latest annual report of the Howard Association is evidence of the useful work performed by the Society. The report refers to the visit paid to American prisons in the spring by the secretary, Mr. Edward Grubb, an account of which has already appeared in our columns. We have also a review of what has been done or attempted in prison reform in this or other countries. The section on legislation required points to valuable, if not heroic, reforms, such as separate courts for children; probation officers to supervise young offenders not sentenced to prison; an improvement in the system of licenee whereby prisoners may be released on parole before the expiry of their sentence if they appear to be fit for liberty, and the appointment of suitable parole officers to take the place of present very imperfect and often mischievous police supervision.

THE most hopeful fact noticed in the report is the success of the "Borstal" system. It is too early to speak positively, but whereas the ordinary prison almost always degrades, the Borstal treatment has largely succeeded in reforming. Nearly or quite half (54 out of 122) discharges are doing well—probably quite half, since a number have been lost sight of, and are not likely all to have returned to evil courses. The prisoners at Borstal are young men between 16 and 21 sentenced to rather long terms of imprisonment; their treatment is to a large extent of what is known as the "reformatory" type. To the extension of this system we look as one means of checking recidivism. Another means is to be found in the reform which the Howard Association concur with the Visiting Committee in demanding, viz., the establishment of a Government labour colony to which the youths may be sent until they are able to obtain suitable employment elsewhere.

Among the many organs of peace and international goodwill there is none so worthy of attention as our French contempary, Le Courrier Européen (280, Boulevard Raspail, Paris). Its committee of directors consists of such well-known men as Bjornstjerne Björnson, Jacque Novicon, Nicolas Salmeron, Gabriel Séailles, and Charles Seignobos; and it keeps its readers in touch with the social and political conditions of the various European peoples. Some of the articles which have recently appeared upon the situation in England have been marked by great insight and remarkable grasp of personalities. The reputation of its directors, and the high level of its contributions from all parts of the Continent, raise it at once above the somewhat limited outlook of the ordinary organs of the peace movement, and give it a standing which is at present unique. We note that sample copies will be forwarded on application.

The December number of One and All contains some remarkable accounts of the progress made and enthusiasm manifested in the Adult School Movement. Great demonstrations at Bristol and Sheffield, a record attendance in the Severn-street (Birmingham) Schools, rapid progress in Northampton, the formation of a County Union in the Far West, and the opening of another social club in York, are among the items. The record attendance at Severn-street, or rather at its 36 centres, is between six and seven thousand members: although the various London Schools are steadily increasing, their average of 2,762 for October still remains far in the rear. The movement recently sustained a severe loss in the sudden death of Mr. Ernest Grace, of Bristol, to whose devoted and statesman-like services much of the recent growth in the Bristol district is directly due.

AN "Anglican" contributed to the Liverpool Daily Post of December 21 some "Christmas Thoughts on Japan," in the course of which, having noted that, in spite of all external signs to the contrary, Japan is not really being Westernised at heart, he told how in the "National Church of Japan," founded in 1887, a strong native movement has arisen among the most cultured members for independence of European connection.

It is felt that the element of European ritual, phraseology, and organisation hinders development, and that in the future Church of Japan native ceremonial, habits of thought, and modes of expression should be blended with those Christian doctrines only which are of universal application and none other nor otherwise. This is the progressive reaction which is occupying the minds of our co-religionists in Japan this Christmastide.

This movement is dreaded by many advocates of missionary enterprise at home and abroad; but "Anglican" thinks the dread unreasonable. He feels it to be unworthy of the faith of a Christian in the guidance of the Master, promised to the end. And he adds:—

If Christianity rests on exotic formulæ and ritual, it is obviously inadequate for mankind as a whole. If it is not permissible to worship the Christ in Japanese phraseology as well as in Russian or Latin or English, it is defective as a cosmopolitan religion. If native modes of thought are inadaptable to its deepest truths, it is a failure so far as the larger part of the human race is concerned.

He reminds us how on the conversion of our forefathers many of the old heathen customs and names of Easter and Yuletide were Christianised, and regards it as perfectly legitimate that the same thing should happen in Japan.

"ANGLICAN'S" parable was taken up by the Rev. H. W. Hawkes, from whom the Daily Post published the following letter:—

SIR,—The broad-minded article by "Anglican" entitled "Christmas Thoughts on Japan" in to-day's issue strikes a high note. May I supplement it by a piece of history?

About sixteen years ago the American Unitarian Association sent out, at the earnest request of many thoughtful Japanese, a missionary, afterwards joined by a colleague. Somewhat later it was my privilege to work with them as a volunteer. From the very outset the keynote of this mission was identical with the view "Anglican" puts forth. We only professed to offer information as to another aspect of Christian teaching which we believed to be more in harmony with modern knowledge and thought, but we deprecated all idea of establishing another foreign sect in Japan. On the contrary, we urged that the great need was that of a Japanese form of Christianity, which should combine with the great ideals of the latter all that was best and most helpful in their ancient faiths. While a great conference of foreign and Chinese and Japanese ministers held in Shanghai totally condemned what is called Ancestor worship, we pointed out the beauty and educative power of reverence for those into whose labours we have entered, and only urged a lofty Theism as including all the good of past and present. Thus ancestor worship would become thanksgiving for ancestors. This position attracted much attention, and helped greatly to leaven the native converts of the various sects. Even before I returned home, the native ministers in a large synod outvoted their foreign teachers, and abolished all formulas but the Apostles' Creed, so-called, while even this was too dogmatic for some.

If such a movement as that described by "Anglican" is an established fact, I feel I may safely claim that the mission of the American Unitarian Association has had much to do with it. It is noteworthy also that when it was felt that full information had been given as to liberal Christianity the missionaries were withdrawn, and the Japanese were left to work out their own religious evolution.—Yours, &c.,

H. W. HAWKES.

Waterloo, December 21, 1904.

THE forecast of the Christian Freeman for 1905 promises to make a special feature of reports of elder scholars' clubs and guilds, which will be a piece of very good service. The Sunday-school lessons are not to be continued, and teachers who require such help are referred to the Monthly Notes issued by the Sunday School Association. There will be a new serial story by the author of "Ivy," for which, after this year's experience, we shall look with much interest. Other good features lead us to hope for the Freeman a continued career of real usefulness in the interest especially of the young people, as they grow out of the Young Days circle.

WAR.

AN EPISODE.

[In the hand of a French Captain, who died on the field of Wörth, was found crushed a letter from his little daughter Marguerite.]

FIELD of battle! though historian tell thy triumph, count thy gain, Strikes on countless hearts thy glory an ever-echoing chord of pain.

It is well, amid thy glories, we should view thy sadder side;
Wörth shall give one glimpse what war is,
with what thoughts one warrior died.

Did he fear defeat's dishonour? Did he curse the conquering foe?
Weep, as faint he sank upon her sacred soil, his country's woe?

Look! what clasp those firm-clenched fingers? weapon-weary, yet they cling,
Clutching close the love that lingers round his dear one's pencilling.

Hand that canst not yet forget her, what sweet constancy is thine!
Let me take thy crumpled letter, reverent
read the loving line:

"Dearest Father,—Since we parted, ceaseless do I think of thee, Dream we meet and am glad-hearted; wake to weep it may not be.

"O come quick, and kiss thy daughter, who lives but to hope and pray
Safe return for him that taught her: 'God hears even what children say.'

"I am very good and trying—mother bids me send thee word—
Hard to comfort her sad sighing till thy voice once more is heard.

"Feel my arms around thee clinging, feel the thousand kisses sweet
Which this little letter's bringing from thy loving—Marguerite."

End of all their expectation widow's anguish! orphan's grief!
Who can paint their desolation? What can give their pangs relief?

LITERATURE.

DR. HASTINGS' DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE.*

EXTRA VOLUME.

Two years ago we were able to congratulate Dr. Hastings on the completion of a great work by the publication of the fourth and concluding volume of his "Dictionary of the Bible"; but then already we were promised the extra volume which is the subject of the present notice.

Two hundred pages are devoted to elaborate indexes to the whole work, the index of subjects, in large type, being particularly welcome, and a capital guide to all that the Dictionary contains. But this essential addition is by no means all that the extra volume contains. It is a further contribution of the highest value to the study of the Bible. There are 37 more articles, several of which are complete treatises which, if printed in ordinary type and size of page, would make substantial volumes by themselves. This is especially true of the article on the Religion of Israel, by Professor Kautzsch, of Halle, which fills 120 pages of the Dictionary and is a most valuable and admirably arranged survey of the whole subject, from the primitive origins and the time of Moses down to the Priestly Code and the Wisdom literature, and ending with "Ecclesiastes," "a final demonstration of the insufficiency of the Law and the need of Christ." A separate article of thirty pages by the Rev. W. Fairweather, of Kirkcaldy, deals with the "Development of Doctrine in the Apocryphal Period," as it is found in the Jewish literature of the last two centuries B.C. and the first A.D. Side by side with these are placed articles on "The Religion of Greece and Asia Minor," by Professor Ramsay (with a special section on the "Worship of Apollo," by Dr. L. R. Farnell), "The Religion of Egypt," by Professor Weidemann of Bonn, and "The Religion of Babylonia and Assyria," by Professor Morris Jastrow, Jr., of the University of Pennsylvania, who also writes on the "Races of the Old Testament." Thus the comparative study of religion finds here full acknowledgment.

The weakest article in this extra volume, we should say, is that on the Trinity, by the Rev. Hugh M. Scott, D.D., of the Chicago Theological Seminary. If students have patience to read it, and following its guidance consider all the astonishing old assumptions and inferences, we should imagine that it would make hundreds of Unitarians. Consistency demanded, no doubt, an article on this subject, but it is significant that the author's final note on "Literature" should begin:—"There is no recent literature on this subject." From the modern apologetic point of view we imagine that the editor would have been wiser to be content with what Professor Sanday had already written in the Dictionary in his articles on "Jesus Christ" and on "God (in the New Testament)." In Dr. Scott's view the Jewish teaching concerning God "was comprehensive but confused. It had elements of the Trinity in it, but did not know what to do with them." "Judaism, in spite of particular workings of the Spirit, did not have the Holy Ghost." But when Christ came, at the Incarnation, "It seems clear that, while the Spirit acts as a Person, the parentage is ascribed to the Father." In the next column we are informed that Jesus "was baptized for service in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost"; and the paragraph concludes:—

> The Synoptists add that the Father spake from heaven, when the Spirit descended, saying, "Thou art My beloved Son" (Matt. iii. 17, Mark i. 11, Luke iii. 22). The objective dove symbol was an indication that the Spirit was distinct from the Father who spoke, and from the Son who heard the Father's voice and beheld the dove descend (Mark i. 10).

That is sufficient to indicate the quality of this article. But if this appears to be retrograde compared with what has already appeared in the Dictionary, we note in another instance an advance, at any rate in thoroughness of treatment, for there is here one duplicate article on English Versions of the Bible. To the fourth volume the Rev. G. Milligan contributed an article on this subject, beginning with Wiclif and coming down to the Revised Version, but it only occupied five and a half pages; in the extra volume we have another article under the same heading by Dr. J. H. Lupton, filling 36 pages, and beginning with Caedman, Bede, and Alfred. It gives a very elaborate account both of the "Authorised" and "Revised" Versions.

Among the most valuable of the new articles are those dealing with the "Agrapha," the sayings attributed to Jesus not found in our Canonical Gospels, by Professor J. H. Ropes, of Harvard; the "Code of Hammurabi," by the Rev. C. H. W. Johns, of Cambridge; and the "Diaspora," by Professor Schürer, of Göttingen, with its survey of the Jewish people as scattered over the Empire, and a study of the conditions of their life, political, social, and religious.

The article on Philo is by Dr. Drummond, of Manchester College, Oxford, who has made that subject his own, while Dr. Schechter, of New York, writes on the Talmud. Two other articles, by Professor Ramsay, must be mentioned, the one on "Numbers, Hours, Years, and Dates," the other on "Roads and Travel (in the New Testament)," one of the most elaborate and valuable in the whole work.

The articles are not arranged alphabetically in this volume, as in a Dictionary, but there is an alphabetical list, so that any article can be quickly found. This extra volume is to be as warmly commended as the four volumes of the Dictionary itself, and we congratulate Dr. Hastings once more on what he has accomplished.

HOLTZMANN'S LIFE OF JESUS.

THE last generation of scholars was eagerly occupied with attempts to reconstruct the life of Jesus. In this country the apologetic efforts of Farrar, Geikie, and Edersheim have had no successors, save for the well-known article contributed by Professor Sanday to Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible. From another side came such works as "The Jesus of History," which frankly discharged the miraculous from the Gospel narratives. Meanwhile the literary investigation of the Gospels has been prosecuted with unremitting zeal; and the study of the Apocalyptic books has engaged continuous attention with results that are as yet by no means exhausted. It is natural, therefore, for younger workers to attack this great problem afresh. Dr. Holtzmann entered the field seventeen years ago with a book on the fourth Gospel (1887). He contributed the section on Jesus to the second volume of Stade's "History of the People of Israel" (1888). He wrote an excellent manual on "New Testament Times" for a well-known German series (1895); he has published various learned dissertations and lectures of a more popular kind. His familiarity with the vast literature illustrating his subject is extensive. By scholarship and erudition he has every right to be heard; and the volume now offered to the public deserves serious consideration.*

In such an effort success must, of course, be doubtful. The writer may, like Strauss, deliberately apply to the Gospel stories a mythological key which has been found available elsewhere. Or, like Renan, by a brilliant exercise of sympathetic imagination, he may endeavour to present a human Jesus in the glow of his first triumphs or the gloom of later failure. Or, with Keim, he may pile around the central figure a vast mass of archæological and critical detail, pouring on to his page the contents of a cyclopædia. These things have been done, and do not need to be repeated, from the same points of view. What seems to us to be really needed is a modern "Vie de Jesus," with the added knowledge of the last forty years, and the same firm grip of the human side of the story, minus some of the effusive sentiment and unctuous patronage which disfigured for so many readers some of the pages of that wonderful book. But such a work it is not in Dr. Holtzmann's power to give us. No competent and earnest-minded student can essay the task undertaken in this substantial volume without throwing incidental light on particular sayings, suggesting some fresh grouping, awakening some new admiration. In this the author does not fail. But his treatment seems sometimes so arbitrary, even so feeble, that it is difficult to follow it with any measure of assent.

The inevitable chapter on the sources follows the current lines of synoptic criticism, and selects Mark as the oldest evangelic record. The fourth Gospel is the delineation of a later age, in which the central figure has been completely remodelled; but it contains some correct historical data, such as the true day of the crucifixion. Noteworthy is the author's use of the fragments of the Gospel according to the Hebrews, which are effectively employed on several occasions. These views determine the chief elements in the chronological scheme. The appearance of John the Baptist is placed early in 28 A.D.; Jesus begins to preach some time before Pentecost in the same year; the crucifixion is assigned to 29. Further, Jesus is not publicly known as Messiah till after Peter's declaration at Cæsarea Philippi. The translators have done their best for Dr. Holtzmann, but they cannot lift him above the level style in which he plods along his way. Here is the approach to the avowed turning-point of the whole story :—

> Whilst travelling along the road in this district, it occurs to Jesus to ask his disciples what opinions the people hold regarding him. It may very well be that before this they had sought to comfort him by pointing to the high opinion in which he was held by the multitude. Jesus now wishes to learn further particulars. (P. 319.)

Following Mark, then, the author argues that Jesus held his function in reserve from his disciples till this crisis. But it had been clear to his own mind from his baptism. This corresponds, in his view, to a real spiritual event in his inner history. The temptation which follows was also an actual experience. The form may be due to pictorial imagination, but the trials beset him in the first glow of his Messianic consciousness; just—so Dr. Holtzmann is confident—when he was engaged in a deep study of Deuteronomy.† This kind of affectation of precision is irritating to some readers, perhaps misleading to others. It is one thing, with the author of "Philochristus," artistically to invent suitable occasions for sayings which seem gathered from various traditions, and are only accidentally located side by side upon the Gospel page. That is by way of illustrating their spiritual force. But Dr. Holtzmann transposes parables into fresh connections without any warrant. Thus the story of the two sons is detached from the Jerusalem series, and assigned (with a little apology for such positiveness) to a most unlikely position—the scene at Capernaum, when his kinsfolk come to take him home on the ground that he is out of his senses. What can be its application in such a connection? The relatives of Jesus had been moved by the Baptist's appeals, and promised repentance and reform, but afterwards returned to their familiar ways.

"Jesus, on the other hand, said at first, No"—(this seems to be founded on the story in the Gospel according to the Hebrews)—"but afterwards not only went to John, but from the moment that he did so placed his whole life at the service of the Gospel which John was the first to preach." The reader will, however, remember that the reluctance of Jesus (according to the Gospel of the Hebrews) does not arise from unwillingness to do the heavenly will, but from such inward superiority that he does not need John's baptism of repentance. The cases are in no way analogous. To what seems to us a late and awkward apology for the submission of the sinless Messiah to a baptism of forgiveness Dr. Holtzmann ascribes a historical value which it cannot, in our judgment, possess, and then misinterprets it to justify, by a kind of tour de force, a violent rearrangement of the narrative.

In other cases the author tries to save some historical reality, with the result that the whole story becomes unintelligible. The feeding miracles are "popular exaggerations of occurrences felt to be wonderful" (p. 76). But what actually happened? Who can extract any consistent picture from the following sentences:

> Having once succeeded in feeding the multitude in this way, it was, of course, only natural that Jesus should come forward and help in the same way on another occasion. Such a person as he, knowing all the needs and exigencies of life, never forgetting the man who stood or sat before him, may well have felt really heartfelt joy in thus feeding the hungry. On the other hand, the numbers given cannot be accepted as historical. . . . We are to understand that the bread increased whilst passing through Jesus' hand. But if this were so, it would mean the accomplishment of an extremely remarkable interference with Nature for a relatively slight purpose; the only effect of it would probably have been to divert attention from Jesus' preaching of repentance, and direct it towards the great miracle-worker. No; in these, as in other cases, Jesus simply desired to help.

In this cloud of words there is no clear idea of what was really done. If the author thinks something took place, but he cannot tell what, he should frankly say so, instead of enveloping the whole in a fog. Here, as elsewhere, when he narrates the shrivelling of the fig tree under the curse of Jesus (which he accepts on the ground that it was only a tree), his treatment seems to depend on the assumption that the historian must accept the earliest form of a Gospel story. He is justified in choosing among the Synoptists; but he must not try to get behind what he regards as the primitive type. The Transfiguration, however, he cannot literally receive. It is transformed into an inner experience of Peter after his avowal, "Thou art the Messiah."

These instances must suffice as samples of the author's treatment. The chapter entitled "Amongst the Heathen" brings clearly into view the often-neglected fact that after the final breach with the Pharisees over the question of purifications and defilements Jesus was driven to seek temporary safety in flight. In regard to the doctrine of the "last things," the author holds that this was a part of Jesus' original preaching, as it had been of that of John. The announcement "The kingdom of heaven has come nigh" meant from the outset that the Messianic judgment would shortly take place. In technical language, Dr. Holtzmann's whole interpretation of Jesus' preaching is eschatological. The judgment, with his own share in it as Messiah, is in his mind from the outset, and he was from the first confident that it would take place in his own generation. This explanation is persistently carried through all the parables, spite of every difficulty. Dr. Holtzmann wholly ignores the existence of any other form of the doctrine of the kingdom; and he pays surprisingly little attention to the varieties of Apocalyptic doctrine about the functions and appearance of the Messiah. He treats the conception as if it were quite clear and universally accepted. This precision again seems unwarrantable; at any rate, it needs some justification instead of being taken for granted. The final interpretation of the person of Jesus consequently shows some wavering: the events which he predicted did not come to pass; in what light, then, are we to view him? In so many passages the limitations of his humanity are frankly enforced (p. 302) that we read with surprise in a note (p. 133): "When we see that he was dependent, as we are, upon God's providence, we experience for the first time a true feeling of the overpowering greatness of his Godhead." At the close this claim is dropped. Jesus is presented (p. 507) as "one who trusted in God with unreserving boldness, as one who laboured with increasing and unfaltering faithfulness in the service of others," &c. What, then, becomes of the Messiahship? It was a pledge that "by the grace of God each and everyone who belonged to the Messiah might some day win eternal happiness in the holiness of perfection." Can anything be more perverse? The Messiahship as Jesus held it is admitted to be an illusion; yet the credit of the church must be saved. The destiny of the believer depends on adherence to an idea which has no historic reality, and to promises which were never fulfilled; and the grace of God is slipped in to make the transaction trustworthy. When will theologians have the courage to abandon the creeds which they have emptied of their ancient validity, and rely for "salvation" on the creative and redeeming purpose of the Eternal Love?

J. E. C.

† Similarly out of the parable of the houses built on rock and sand, Paul's references to "edification," &c., it is argued that Jesus was a working builder. In the same style he might have been a farmer, a vineyard keeper, a travelling merchant; just as Shakespere must have filled a dozen or more different occupations.

THEOLOGICAL TRANSLATION LIBRARY.*

MR. CARPENTER'S review of the second volume of Wernle's "Beginnings of Christianity," in Messrs. Williams & Norgate's Theological Translation Library, appeared in THE INQUIRER of December 10. Three other volumes of the highest value have been published during the present year in the same series, the titles of which are noted below.

The late Dean Sabatier's masterly work on "The Religions of Authority and the Religion of the Spirit" was left by him practically complete, although it did not receive his final revision. It is a sequel to his "Outlines of a Philosophy of Religion based upon Psychology and History," published in 1897, and in two successive books, with his well-known lucidity and wide grasp of the subject, traces the history and presents a criticism of the Roman Catholic and the Protestant Dogma of Authority, passing thence in a third and concluding book to his own interpretation of the Religion of the Spirit, of which Jesus Christ was the founder, and which is now to be possessed by those who learn to share the secret of his religious life. This work the author speaks of in his final words as "only a preliminary essay," which he hopes may attract "new labourers, stronger and more able than himself," into the field. Certainly it will attract many grateful readers, who will be thankful indeed for such guidance.

Professor Réville's Memoir presents a welcome picture of the author, and of the manifold devoted labours which he crowded into the twenty-five years of his service in Paris, from the establishment of the Protestant Theological Faculty in 1875. Sabatier's position as a teacher M. Réville thus describes:—

> The solid ground of our religious and moral life is experience: the individual experience of the modern man, confirmed by the similar experience revealed by the history of the past, or by the observation of other people around us. For the Christian it is, above all, the experience of Jesus Christ.
> Hence it is easy to understand how he is able, with perfect freedom, to apply historical criticism to the text of the Bible, and to the dogmas of the Church. His piety does not rest upon these, but upon the inner witness of the Spirit. For him the Word of God is not the letter of an historical writing, or of an ecclesiastical decree, but the voice of the Spirit speaking to men in their religious and moral experiences, and only intelligible to those who themselves pass through the same experiences. In other words, they alone understand the voice of the Spirit in the past who understand it in the present.

Professor von Dobschütz, who has recently passed from Jena to Strassburg, as successor to the veteran Holtzmann in the Chair of New Testament Theology, says in the Preface to the English edition of his work on "Christian Life in the Primitive Church," that the most remarkable feature of modern development is that all differences of dogma and creed disappear before the great practical tasks of the day. "These tasks all endeavour to accomplish. This is just what we observe in Primitive Christianity It is the true spirit of Christian life." The object of this book is to give a picture of early Christian life on its moral side. In this he finds the most effective proof of the truth of Christianity, the essence of which he holds to be "faith in God through Jesus Christ, His only begotten Son," which faith must be given by revelation. That was the force which led to the triumph of Christianity in the world.

His study covers the first century of the Christian Church, beginning with an elaborate examination of the condition of the Pauline Churches, then dealing more briefly with the Jewish Christendom, and passing to the later Christianity among the Heathen, down to the transition to Catholicism. The last work examined is the Shepherd of Hermas, which gives a picture of the life of members of the Roman Church at the end of the period. It is not an altogether edifying picture, and yet there was a force in Christianity which was destined to conquer. It was not to superiority of dogma, Professor Dobschütz declares, that Christianity owed its final victory. Neo-platonism was superior in speculative power and logical completeness, nor was it to higher moral teaching, for that was also found in Stoicism and Neo-platonism; it was to the personal force which appealed to people of every class, issuing from Christ himself, giving mere "reliance on God's grace in Jesus Christ." This "begot in Christians a matchless delight in doing good," and so they conquered the world.

An English translation of Professor Harnack's elaborate work on "the Expansion of Christianity in the First Three Centuries," from the very capable hands of Dr. James Moffatt, is sure of a cordial welcome in this country. Only the first volume is as yet published. Of the work as a whole, in its original form, published two years ago, Dr. Moffatt wrote a review in the Hibbert Journal for April, 1903. He there spoke of it as a sequel to Harnack's own lectures in "What is Christianity?" and Weizsäcker's "Apostolic Age." To complete the study Harnack's "History of Dogma" must be also read.

PUBLICATIONS OF THE A.U.A.

We have received from the American Unitarian Association a number of new publications, which are a welcome testimony not only to great energy in this most important department of its work, but also to successful effort in producing really beautiful books. In the matter of printing, of artistic title-pages, and decorated binding, these books set a high standard of excellence.

The volume by Dr. M. J. Savage, "Pillars of the Temple" (90 cents net), to which Robert Collyer stands god-father, is a re-statement in eight sermons of the fundamentals of the Liberal Faith; that by Dr. J. H. Crooker on "The Supremacy of Jesus" (80 cents net) reproduces in book form the articles he contributed some little time ago to the Springfield Republican. To these volumes we hope to return before long for fuller notice.

"The Touch of Nature," by A. M. Lord (1 dollar net), is a volume of stories prompted by a happy thought and happily illustrated by Edith Barry. Fourteen stories of as many nationalities tell once more some popular legend or story of the various countries, beginning with the American Indian and ending with Norway. The English story is of the White Thorn of Glastonbury, the Irish of St. Patrick.

"The Wandering Host," by David Starr Jordan, President of the Leyland Stanford University, is an allegory, reprinted from an earlier Californian edition, representing, under the guise of a journey over a rugged mountain and across a dreary plain, to the great river from the further side of which no traveller returns, the various ways in which truth is pursued and the Christian Gospel interpreted. The final lesson is the old word, "Thy neighbour as thyself." The author's ideal is expressed in some introductory lines. When man rises to his full destiny, each one shall find the holiest of holies in the secret chamber of his own heart,

> Each man must kindle his own altar fires
> Each burn an offering of his own desires,
> And each, at last, his own High Priest shall be.

We cannot honestly say that the allegory has taken hold of us, but the book, with decorated borders for every page, is beautifully produced.

"John Gilley," by Charles Eliot (60 cents net), which reproduces a magazine article, is the first volume in a new series of "True American Types." It is the simple record of a Maine farmer and fisherman, whose father settled on a hitherto uninhabited island off the coast, to make his home there, and who himself lived a long and honourable life of humble enterprise and diligence. We shall look with the greatest interest for further volumes in the series.

PROFESSOR KNIGHT'S RETROSPECTS.*

PROFESSOR KNIGHT has been fortunate in the wide circle of his friends, and is thus enabled, in his Retrospects, to bring us into close touch with many of the chief Englishmen of the last century. This first series tells of Carlyle, Tennyson, Browning, Gladstone, Maurice, Martineau, Stanley, Matthew Arnold, and others. The second series is to include Ruskin, Newman, Watts, Lowell, Spencer, Lecky, Jowett, Seeley, Rossetti, and others. The notes on Gladstone are slight, and some of the most interesting of the Retrospects deal with comparatively unknown men, such as William Davies, of Warrington, James Smetham (the artist), and Whitwell Elwin (for fifty years rector of Booton in Norfolk, and from 1854 to 1867 editor of the Quarterly Review). The last two chapters tell of Miss Anna Swanwick and J. H. Shorthouse.

Professor Knight has plenty of good stories, and quotes a number of interesting letters from many of his friends, while his own observations serve to cast welcome light on well-known characters.

Of Tennyson, he says:—

> There was a wonderful simplicity allied to his clear vision, and his strength. He was more childlike than the majority of his contemporaries; and, along with this, there was—as already mentioned—a great reserve of power. His appreciation of other workers belonging to his time was remarkable. Neither he nor Browning disparaged their contemporaries, as Carlyle so often did when he put them in the pillory. From first to last Tennyson looked sympathetically on all good work, and he had a special veneration for the strong, silent, thinkers and workers.

There is a most interesting record of a long talk with Tennyson, at the beginning of a two days' visit to Farringford in May, 1890, in the course of which we find this note as to the poet's method of work.

> He added that his chief work was done, not as Wordsworth's had been, in the open air, but in his library, and in the evenings. It seemed as if he needed the quiet of the close of day, and the meditative reverie to which it led, to start him productively.

* "Retrospects." By William Knight, Emeritus Professor of Philosophy in the University of St. Andrews. First Series. (Smith, Elder & Co. 9s. net.)

Of Browning also there are very pleasant glimpses, with an instructive comment on printers' errors (p. 91). Browning once declared to Professor Knight that all the unintelligibility of Sordello was due to them, because they would change his punctuation, and not print his own commas, semicolons, dashes and brackets! Poets, he remarked, were special sufferers from the dropping out of stops at the end of lines, after proofs had been finally revised.

We turned with special interest to the section on James Martineau, from whom Professor Knight has already published the valuable letters in Inter Amicos. What is here added of correspondence, after the appearance of the "Life and Letters," is not a great deal. There is more repetition of letters from the "Life" than Professor Knight seems to have noticed, from the remark in his preface, and the letters as to the "Spinoza" though interesting, do not complete the story. The letter as to Sabatier (on p. 139)) should be dated 1897, not 1891. (cf. Life, ii., p. 228). In his preface Professor Knight notes that the originals of the 109 letters he received from Dr. Martineau are now at Manchester College, Oxford.

One of the most interesting of the letters which are new is that dated Jan. 31, 1874 telling of a visit to the Master of Balliol, "one of the wisest and most attractive of men," with this comment on the Broad Churchmen: "Intellectually I am at one with them; personally, they win me; but morally, they perplex me." But most valuable of all appears to us the first letter quoted, dated from Scotland, July 11, 1871. Readers of Mr. Armstrong's summary of the "Study of Religion," published as one of Clarke's "Small Books on Great Subjects," may remember that in the preface Mr. Armstrong recorded how in the last conversation he had with Dr. Martineau, he had acknowledged that the argument from the intuition of the Sublime and Beautiful, as bearing witness to God, was equally valid with the arguments from Causation and the Moral Law, which are the great subject of the "Study of Religion," and here, in this letter, nearly thirty years earlier, we find a similar admission. Dr. Martineau writing with approval of the constructive part of an essay by his correspondent, hesitates, "as a matter of form, to treat the apprehension of God as an immediate intuition," and adds:—

> Rather does it seem to me the necessary interpretation of two or three confluent intuitions—of Causality, of Obligation, and of Beauty—of which it finds the unity and repose. This is rather a difference of statement than of thought, and I do not know that there is anything to choose between the two modes of putting the case. But I fancy that the recognition of a plurality of sources enables one to give a better account of the broken lights of faith which gleam upon us in imperfect religions, short of the vision of the Living God.

We have only one further criticism to offer on this chapter. Professor Knight says that in Dr. Martineau's essay on "A Way Out of the Trinitarian Controversy," he "admitted a metaphysical doctrine of the Trinity." But in the essay itself we find no such admission. It is true, as Professor Knight says, that Martineau there pointed out that "in what constitutes the pith and kernel of both faiths" (Trinitarian and Unitarian) "the two are agreed." But the point of the argument is that the "Father" of Unitarian worship is identical with "the Son" of the Trinitarian (and to some extent also, with "the Spirit"), so that, as a matter of fact, they worship the same living God. The "way out" to which he pointed was along the lines of a higher, spiritual Unitarianism.

We should have been glad to linger over the personal aspects of this book, and particularly to quote some beautiful touches in the chapter on Dean Stanley, whose last letter was written to Dr. Martineau, but we must refrain, and can only thank Professor Knight for the great pleasure we have derived from his record, of which we are very glad that a further instalment is to come.

TWO VOICES.*

Two little books we link together in this notice, by independent writers, unknown to one another, but neither of them unknown to readers of THE INQUIRER, since verses of both have appeared in these columns.

The Tribal Lays "Suspiriosae Cogitationes," are published anonymously, save that they are by the author of "Poems and other Verses," which were published in 1896 by "H. A. R. J."; and some of the verses in this new volume are to be found over the same initials in the columns of THE INQUIRER, so that our friend cannot be altogether concealed. As a reminder of his manner, we will quote at once these lines on "Private Baptism":

"Just in time! ah! God is good;
For the infant died as I marked his brow
With the blessed sign of the Holy Rood,
And his spirit is with the angels now."

"Just in time! And suppose you late—
Not every parson could run that race;
Were the infant damned?" "We leave his fate
To God's uncovenanted grace."

"Dare you to tell me, Reverend Friend,
Heaven's crowns hang on your vestry pegs?
And the covenant mercies of God depend
On the length and strength of a parson's legs?"

Mr. Betham's quaint little book is, most of it, new to us, though we have already had the pleasure of publishing a few of these, and other of his verses. The book is quaint and original in manner, a mixture of verse and prose, and its meaning will not always be clear to the ordinary reader. A man "of mid-years" tells how he escaped from the city and started "in a worm coat along the highway," to follow his own bent. He declares himself "a pilgrim called Growth, bound for the hope of the future," and falls in with "Humor," in whom he finds plenty of sound wisdom and wholesome temper and common sense. The record of their pilgrimage is in fragments, and often enigmatical, but it is pictured by a poet's imagination, and by a man who determines to be true to himself, and delights in natural things and people, and the open country. Those who will take the trouble to understand Mr. Betham may find stimulus and wisdom in his pages. One section, less obscure than some, we will quote as an example:—

> Quoth Humor:
> "Behold!"
> On pavement stood one in a frock coat,
> His hat shining like a nimbus,
> His cheeks fresh of hue,
> His person plump,
> His heels unworn;
> Behind him his family, comforting to the eye of the hosier, the tailor, and the maker of stays.
> Thus Humor:
> "This is he who thinks all's well with the world;
> Who would alter nothing:
> Who surveys the universe from his suburb,
> From the summit of his morning paper,
> And purrs:
> He would alter nothing.
> He believes the wall-paper upholds the house,
> And says, 'It has always been so'!
> Behold him! chief of earth's idolaters,
> The man who would alter nothing!"

That is perhaps the least poetical of Mr. Betham's visions, but it shows his temper. Here is another fragment, given as a separate section, with a page to itself.

> O, up and away in the morning!
> Out of the street,
> Out of the town,
> There's a path, and a hill, and eyes I know,
> Fresh and fair at morning.

"H. A. R. J." is also one who has determined to be true to himself, and through adversity has learnt wisdom. The Times, we notice, has said of him that he "has a leaning for philosophy and a genuine poetic impulse to say what he thinks and feels." We may learn from this little book of verse that he is a man of University training, who has had the experiences of an invalid at Davos, and has been in Australia, probably in search of health, and that ten years after leaving Oxford he went back, with the lesson of renunciation deeply engraven on his heart:—

> For tho' in joy one cry "Send me!"
> When rings the challenge "Who will go?"
> 'Tis folly chides his destiny
> Who hears inexorable "No!"
> A strong, sure peace is mine; content
> Derived of failure won in strife;
> And on each spire and battlement
> I spell the legend "great is Life."
> Mortals shall have their Mercuries;
> His Ganymedes be found for Jove;
> It is of sound Philosophies
> To know self-pity masks self-love!

Of the longer pieces in this book two of the most striking are "A Moonlight Ride in Tasmania" and "A Winter Walk in Switzerland"; of the shortest, this epigram from the Greek:—

> A Pauper in ways and a Crœsus in pelf;—
> How rich for your heirs, and how poor for yourself.

There is abundant variety in these pages, keen insight, true feeling, and always a brave spirit. The author is one who > "fain would sing to a humble heart the song of a trustful hope;"

but not on the lines of any orthodox scheme of salvation, nor in compliance with any worldly standard of success: His hope is that "with some small spud of homely wit," he may help to make a plain path in these modern days for a living faith.

Let those who may their Revelation find
In words no better than a man could write:
Be mine the impress of Eternal Mind
On a world worthy of the Infinite.

We are tempted to quote further, but must be content to refer readers of this little book (and we hope they will be many) to the "Song of Jubilee," strong in its patriotism as in its discontent, to the lines on "Poetry," on "Traditionalism," and on "Qui miser esse potest," as among the best examples of the variety and the power to be found in these poems. And in conclusion we will add the author's "L'Envoi."

Tho' the world be dark with pain;
Steeped with tears the bread we gain;
Tho' the anguish of man's strife
Close but with the close of life;

Faith is ours (no wavering mood
Vanquishes) that God is good.
Hope is ours that Man must climb
Far beyond his sordid prime.

Love is ours, to light our way
Thro' the darkness to the day;
Present Guerdon, future Hope,
Urging Faith to boundless scope.

Love that fills domestic claims;
Love inspiring social aims;
Love, unbound by race or creed,
Asking nought of man but need.

Glad of heart, may all who move
Thro' life's darkness lit with love
Grudge no ray of warmth and light,
Where their brethren toil thro' night.

OBITUARY.

MR. R. W. WRIGHT.

OUR obituary column briefly announced last week the death on December 15 of Mr. Robert William Wright, at his residence in Wellesley-road, Croydon. Mr. Wright, who was in his eighty-seventh year, was formerly well-known in connection with the Gravel Pit Congregation, Hackney, of which he was treasurer for an unbroken period of twenty years, retaining his seat on the Committee to the end of his life. His father, the late Mr. R. J. P. Wright, of Clapton-square (manager of the Imperial Insurance Company), and his grandfather, were also connected with the same congregation, so that the Wright family were members for nearly the whole of the nineteenth century. Mr. Wright was an architect in early life, but was subsequently engaged in other occupations. On removing from Hackney to Croydon he took an active part in the Oakfield-road congregation, and was especially interested in the Dennett Hall Domestic Mission, presiding for some time as Chairman of the Committee. For several years he was a member of the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and, to the time of his death, of the Council, although, on account of increasing infirmities, he had been unable for some years to attend the meetings. The funeral took place on Monday week at the Croydon cemetery, Rev. Gordon Cooper officiating in the absence of the Rev. W. J. Jupp.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"WE ALWAYS MAY BE WHAT WE MIGHT HAVE BEEN."

BESSIE often had hard times, but it was not for want of a happy home and all that a child could wish for; her troubles came from herself, for though she was a loving and generous girl, she was very passionate. She tried to control herself, but often she failed sadly; and then, when the fit of passion was over, she was deeply sorry and penitent. Many a resolve she made, but still she was not cured.

Bessie was the eldest of the family, and the three brothers who came next were away at school. One day she was left to take care of and amuse the two youngest little children; and for a time they were all very happy; then suddenly their mother heard loud screams, and quarrelsome voices, and crying. On going to see what was the matter she found Bessie in a violent passion, and Mary and little Jack crying with all their might in a corner, and looking frightened. They had been obstinate, and not done what Bessie told them, and she had got angry, and shaken and slapped them well. Their mother gently put Bessie out of the room, and said, "Go to your room, Bessie; I will come to you presently." Then she soothed and quieted the little children, and set them to play together alone.

When she opened the door Bessie was still in the passage, but crying bitterly. Her mother took her hand to lead her upstairs, but she hung back, and cried, "Oh, don't send me away, mother; I'll be good. They were naughty, mother. It wasn't my fault; they ought to be punished." Her mother led her up to her room, and, though she cried bitterly, she left her there, saying, "When you are quiet, Bessie, I will come back to you; lie down now and quiet yourself." The mother's face was very gentle, but very grave and sad.

She left her for some time, but listened often to hear if she were quieter; and before very long all was so quiet that her mother went in and found that she had dropped asleep.

When Bessie awoke, her mother was sitting in the room with her work. They looked at each other, but neither spoke. Then Bessie turned her face away, and her eyes were full of tears. "Oh, mother," she said, "I shall never, never be any better!"

Her mother laid down her work, and took up a book. "When I was a girl at school, Bessie, about your age, I did something very naughty, and when I came to myself and saw how naughty I had been I felt as you do, that I should never get over it; but something which I found in this book helped me as nothing ever did before. It was this sentence: 'To-morrow morning, if you choose to take up a spirit of such power, you may rise like a soul without a past, fresh for the future as an Adam untempted yet—with every link of guilty habit shaken off.'"

Bessie sat up on the bed, and looked straight at her mother. She gasped out, "Oh, mother! did you?"

"I failed again and many times, but I never forgot those words and those hopes. They were my greatest help."

"Read it again, mother," she said; and when she finished there was a long silence, but Bessie's face was aglow with a new hope.

After a little while her mother said, "Do you remember what to-morrow is, Bessie? It will be New Year's day, when we all begin a new year. We leave the dear old year behind, with all that it held of joy and sorrow, sin and goodness, pain and pleasure." Bessie stood very still, thinking.

"Shall we begin a true New Year to-morrow morning, Bessie? Shall we leave all old faults and sins behind, and 'rise up like a soul without a past, with every link of guilty habit shaken off'?"

"To-morrow morning?"

Bessie looked up with a face beaming with resolve and longing. "Mother, I will," she said; and they kissed each other with an earnest kiss.

Then her mother prepared to go, and Bessie said, sadly, "Am I to stay here, mother?"

"Yes, to-night, dear; the children are having their tea, and I will send you yours; and then you must all go to sleep, and awake to a new and better day to-morrow."

She was going away, but Bessie caught her hand and held her back. Very gently and pleadingly she said, "You'll trust me with Mary and Jack again, mother, won't you?"

"In a little while, dear, when I see that I can trust you." Seeing that she looked very much distressed, she said, "Dear Bessie, listen:—

Your place is kept, and it will wait,
Ready for you to fill it, soon or late;
No star is ever lost we once have seen,
We always may be what we might have been.

Your place is kept," she repeated, and with another kiss she left the room.

Bessie sank down on her pillow with the words ringing on in her ears, "Your place is kept. You always may be what you might have been," and "To-morrow morning." She hid her face and said, "I will; dear God, help me."

She hid the words in her heart, and did not speak of them again, but they helped her through many a hard time. They were a treasure that nothing could take from her, and they supported her till she was again trusted with the little children; and then she felt that her happiness was complete.

GERTRUDE MARTINEAU.

WE grieve, as the year draws to a close, to receive news of the death of the Rev. John White Chadwick, of Brooklyn, N.Y., one of the most distinguished of American Unitarian ministers. Mr. Chadwick is well known in this country also, as a strong preacher, the biographer of Theodore Parker, and more recently of Channing, and as the author of some charming poems and hymns. To the American section in the last edition of Chambers' Encyclopædia of English Literature he contributed the articles on Longfellow, Whittier, Hawthorne, Lowell, Whitman, and others. Forty years ago he succeeded Samuel Longfellow at Brooklyn, and was in active service when the summons, somewhat suddenly, came to him.

LONDON, DECEMBER 31, 1904.

ON THE EVE OF ANOTHER YEAR.

THIS number of THE INQUIRER completes the sixty-third year of its service, and the seventh year during which the present editor has borne the yoke. Of the memories of the past those that are happy and full of encouragement remain the most vivid, and to them at any rate he will hold with great thankfulness at this moment of passing into a new year.

With this number the Programme for 1905 is again sent out as a Supplement, and we would ask of all friends their best endeavour to make it known to others, and thus to extend THE INQUIRER'S opportunities of usefulness. We so often hear of friends in lonely places or in uncongenial surroundings, both in this country and abroad, to whom our paper comes as a helpful and most welcome visitant, that we are doubly anxious that the range of its ministry should be extended, both in reaching more of such solitary ones, and in appealing more directly and urgently to the members of our churches. To this end the help of others in extending the circulation is essential, and the constant effort, which we hope never to relax, so long as this service is required of us, to furnish in these columns matter that shall appeal to mind and heart alike, that shall bring fresh insight into the deeper meanings of life, and touch with living power the affections and aspirations which make its truest worth.

It will be seen that we have promises of help for the New Year which will furnish matter of the highest interest and value, but we hope also to have room for many other contributions. It is our constant desire to make THE INQUIRER a true organ of our Free Churches, to let it be a meeting place for friendly counsel and a source of genuine inspiration and encouragement, to which all may have free access, and in which any friend who has a strong true word to speak may have the opportunity of speaking it. We appeal once more to our friends in confidence and good hope for the New Year.

RETROSPECT OF THE YEAR 1904.

A YEAR darkened by the lurid clouds of war, touched to the quick by its actual horrors, though for us on a distant horizon in the Far East, yet brought home to us by the very grave responsibilities of our alliance with Japan, and incidents in the matter of our shipping, especially of the North Sea outrage, which compelled our people to realise what war between two nations of Europe must now mean.

The horrors of the conflict between Russia and Japan, still dragging out its miserable course, have been on a stupendous scale, marked by a heroic recklessness of self-sacrifice and a dreadful carnage, which we, it is to be feared, have only faintly pictured to ourselves, but which must yet prove to Europe a comment ghastly in its realism on that notable saying of Mr. Secretary Hay's, repeated by Lord Lansdowne at the Lord Mayor's banquet, that war is "the most futile and the most ferocious of human follies."

On every ground we must be thankful that the North Sea incident, when our harmless fisher-fleet was fired upon by Russian war-ships under the delusion of Japanese torpedo boats, ended as it did. The agreement to submit the matter to an international inquiry under the terms of the Hague Convention was a triumph of self-restraint which can hardly fail to make powerfully for a similar wisdom and moderation in the future, when international complications arise.

From this point of view the year had been of good promise, and we have rejoices over the treaties of arbitration signed between this country and France and Germany, and other similar treaties accomplished or on the way to accomplishment, especially that between this country and America. We rejoice also over the suggestion by President Roosevelt, who was re-elected by a great majority to his high office, of a second Peace Conference at the Hague, and over the marked success of the International Peace Congress held in the autumn at Boston. The first meeting of a National Peace Congress at Manchester should also be recorded, and the act of Mr. W. R. Cremer, earlier in the year, in devoting the £7,000 of the Nobel prize, awarded to him for distinguished services in the cause of Peace, to the interests of the International Arbitration League.

We could wish that the record of this country had been all of a similar strain, but we may not forget the British Expeditions into Somaliland and Tibet, the latter a "peaceful" mission, stained by slaughter, and making claims, the issue of which are as yet by no means clear.

Within the borders of the Empire there has been the sinister admission of indentured Chinese labour to the Transvaal mines, in face of the strongest protest both here and in South Africa, while for home legislation the most prominent achievement has been the Government's Licensing Act, with its huge endowment of "the trade." Passive resistance to the Education Acts has been steadily maintained, and the Fiscal controversy has continued to trouble the land. The position of the Government has been subjected to the severe comment of a number of bye-elections. One hopes that before long a general election may help to clear the air.

The problem of the unemployed has been again brought into painful prominence, and schemes for the more effectual meeting of a chronic difficulty are under consideration. The experiment of farm colonies has promised considerable alleviation, and suggestions of national undertakings for re-afforesting and reclaiming waste lands have been made. The project of a "Garden City," for which a site has been secured at Letchworth, near Hitchin, has made marked progress.

Aptly in the midst of the Fiscal controversy came the celebration of the centenary of Cobden's birth. The year brought also the centenary of the deaths of Immanuel Kant and Joseph Priestley, and of the birth of Nathaniel Hawthorne.

ECCLESIASTICAL AFFAIRS.

Among the Churches there have been notable events. Most startling was the judgment of the House of Lords in the case of the United Free Church of Scotland, declaring that a conservative remnant, which was represented in the General Assembly of the Church by a minority of 27 against 643, had alone remained true to the foundation trusts, and was entitled to the whole property, which, with churches and colleges, is valued at millions, while the majority, which claimed the right not only of union, but of theological advance, was dispossessed. The situation is impossible, for the responsibilities of churches, colleges, and missions cannot be met by those who are now declared to be the Free Church, and some method of readjustment, either by agreement or fresh legislation, must be found. The judgment has been a very severe lesson on the danger of theological trusts, further enforced within a smaller area, by the difficulties of Cheshunt College, debarred by its dogmatic trust from a union and readjustment of forces which the managers desired. It will, no doubt, lead to a thorough reconsideration of the whole subject, in which the several Methodist bodies, which are considering plans for re-union, will take a very practical interest. The overtures of the Methodist New Connexion, the United Methodist Free Churches, and the Bible Christians for union have shown fair promise, which the attitude of the Wesleyan Methodists was not permitted to disturb; but the question of trusts may now present unexpected difficulties.

For the Church of England the year has brought the laying of the foundation-stone of the Liverpool Cathedral by the King and the creation of the new Bishopric of Birmingham, to which Bishop Gore goes from Worcester. The visit of the Archbishop of Canterbury to America was regarded as an event, and in the same category may be included the publication of a new and radically revised edition of "Hymns Ancient and Modern." This was preceded by a new edition of the Methodist Hymn-book.

Due to the Church was also the conservative vote of the Oxford Convocation, which refused by an overwhelming majority to open examinerships in the Honour Theological School to laymen, as recommended by Congregation. What was really refused was the right of distinguished Nonconformist scholars to a place upon the board of examiners.

In contrast may be mentioned here the establishment of a Free Theological Faculty in the Victoria University of Manchester, in which prominent members of various religious bodies, including the Principal of the Unitarian Home Missionary College, have an active part.

Among the events of the year must be noted the Centenary of the British and Foreign Bible Society, one welcome act of which, in connection with the celebration, was the publication for the first time of several cheap editions of the Revised Version.

Midsummer saw a remarkable international gathering of the Salvation Army in London, when General Booth was sympathetically received by the King. The closing weeks of the year have brought a religious Revival in South Wales of great spontaneity and fervour, the permanent results of which have yet to be declared. Quite apart from this, the American Revivalist, Dr. Torrey, has been active in his own way, which has included preposterous attacks on the character of Unitarians. These have been met by indignant rebuke not from Unitarians alone, but from many other liberal Nonconformists.

In the field of apologetics there has been great activity directed against the attacks of Mr. Robert Blatchford and his Clarion upon Christianity. One of the most effective popular replies, which has been warmly commended by orthodox Nonconformists and the Church Times alike, has been Dr. Warschauer's "Anti-Nunquam," a sixpenny book which has been very widely read.

We have regretted during the year the departure from London of Dr. John Hunter, of the King's Weigh House Church, to return to his old congregation in Glasgow.

OUR FREE CHURCHES.

The year's events have been so various that it is not easy to determine their proper grouping.

The British and Foreign Unitarian Association has steadily continued its efforts of enlarged work rendered possible by the large increase of its income, and perhaps the first place may be given to the mission undertaken by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, of Leeds, as representative of the Association, to visit the Unitarians of Australasia. Mr. Hargrove left home early in April, and was absent for more than nine months, returning home by way of America. He started from London on April 6, and reached Leeds again on Dec. 17. Going first to Perth in Western Australia, he visited the Unitarian churches in Adelaide, Melbourne, Sydney, and Auckland, New Zealand, going also to Brisbane, Hobart, and other places in Tasmania and New Zealand, where there were no churches, delivering his message of sympathy from the home country and in sermon and lecture bearing the testimony of a Liberal Faith. The response, though nowhere very great in point of numbers, was very cordial, and the mission was thoroughly justified by the result.

Two other visits of sympathy and brotherly encouragement may be noted, that of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong in the spring to Copenhagen, and on behalf of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association; to the new Liberal Congregation established in Christiania, with the Rev. M. Haugerud as minister; and the holiday visit of the Rev. C. J. Street to the Unitarian Churches of Hungary.

Manchester College, Oxford.

It has been a momentous year for Manchester College. At the annual meeting in January the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson resigned the office of secretary, which he had held, in succession to the late Charles Beard, for twenty-four years. He was succeeded in the office of Clerical Secretary by the Rev. Henry Gow, and was himself elected by the new committee as their chairman. The Rev. S. A. Steinthal succeeded Mr. W. Colfox as President.

In response to a requisition of forty-five of their number, a special meeting of the Trustees of the College was held at Oxford, on November 29, to consider a resolution declaring, after a long preamble, that "the historical principle of the College is that it is a non-subscribing Protestant Dissenting Institution," and an amendment moved, on behalf of the Committee, declaring after a counter preamble that "the Trustees will do nothing to limit for themselves and their successors the freedom the College has inherited and has enjoyed for nearly a century and a quarter." The fear of the moving trustees was that the administration of the College was being diverted from fidelity to its trust in allowing any funds to be used for the benefit of a student who had declared his intention of entering the ministry of the Church of England, and also in having an avowed Churchman among its teachers. The contention of the Committee was that the trust of the College was open, and must be strictly so maintained, and that its benefits were for all who accepted the principle and desired training under such conditions. This latter view had received the powerful legal support of Mr. Haldane, K.C., to whom a case had been submitted, and the Committee's amendment was passed by a majority of 113 to 29.

Home Missionary College Jubilee.

Early in July the Jubilee of the Unitarian Home Missionary College was celebrated with great enthusiasm in Manchester. On the suggestion of the old students of the college, enforced by their promise to contribute a collective £1,000 towards the object, the celebration took the form of securing for the college a building of its own. A memorial, very influentially signed, had deprecated this step, on the ground that it was unwise permanently to duplicate our colleges, but this was powerless before the enthusiasm with which the scheme was taken up, and an admirable residence in Victoria Park was secured. The confidence of the friends of the College in its future was greatly strengthened by the new prospect opened by the establishment of a Free Faculty of Theology in the Manchester University. The Jubilee scheme required a sum of £20,000, and more than half of this amount was quickly promised: Deputations subsequently visited London and Ireland, to plead the cause of the College, and met with a very cordial reception and substantial financial support.

Priestley Centenary.

The centenary of the death of Dr. Joseph Priestley on Feb. 6 was celebrated by commemorative meetings at Leeds and Birmingham, two of the chief scenes of his ministry and scientific work in this country; and in Birmingham it was determined to mark the occasion by raising a fund of £5,000 for the benefit of the churches in the Midland Christian Union, which now represent the religious principles of which Priestley in his day was so faithful a confessor. A large part of this amount was given in donations, and a further large addition was made by a Centenary Bazaar held in the Birmingham Town Hall, but the whole £5,000, so far as we have heard, is not yet raised.

At the same time the East Cheshire Christian Union was endeavouring to raise £5,000 for the churches in its district, and a big bazaar to that end was held in Manchester, but although much was done the total was far from being reached.

Other Celebrations and Memorials.

Two church jubilees of special interest have been celebrated, that of the Church of the Divine Unity, in Newcastle-on-Tyne, which represents one of the oldest of our foundations, and that of the Fitzwilliam-street Church in Huddersfield, which was opened by Dr. Martineau. Gratifying personal celebrations were those of the forty years' ministry of the Rev. R. J. Jones at Aberdare, and John Davies at Alltyplaca, and of the twenty-five years' service of the Rev. F. and Mrs. Summers at George's Row Domestic Mission in London.

During the year a memorial tablet has been erected in the Mill-street Domestic Mission to the Rev. John Hamilton Thom, and memorial windows to Miss Lamport, in the Lancaster Chapel, the Rev. P. W. Clayden, in the High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham, and the Rev. C. H. Well-beloved in the Southport Unitarian Church.

New Buildings, &c.

The London District Unitarian Society has made an appeal for £7,500 towards building churches for the three vigorous young congregations at Kilburn, Lewisham, and Plumstead. The new chapel at Lampeter has been opened, an iron church at St. Helens, and enlarged school buildings at Bradford, Manchester, while a similar extension is in progress at Padiham. Services have been inaugurated at Nelson, through the activity of the Burnley congregation, and at Cambridge, especially for students of the University.

Literature and Lectures.

The Unitarian Association has been active in the publications department, and has entered the field with sixpenny reprints, the first volumes issued being

Mr. Armstrong's "God and the Soul," and Mr. Carpenter's "First Three Gospels" (in a revised edition, with a new chapter of great importance). F. W. Newman's "Soul" and other volumes are to follow. Mr. Carpenter's course of lectures on "The Christ of the Creeds and of Experience" was given in the spring at Cardiff, Aberystwyth, and Manchester, and in the autumn at Plumstead, Hampstead, and Bournemouth. A new course of lectures by Mr. Armstrong on "Agnosticism and Theism in the 19th Century," was given in the autumn at Northampton and Nottingham. Both courses were attended by most appreciative audiences, and this is felt to be some of the best educative work done by the Association. Two lectures were also given in Brussels by Mr. Carpenter in French, on "How to Read the Gospels in the Light of Modern Criticism," and these were subsequently published by Fischbacher of Paris.

Two other lectures of the greatest interest were delivered during Whit-week by Professor H. H. Wendt, of Jena, the Essex Hall Lecture, on "The Idea and Reality of Revelation," and a lecture at Manchester College, Oxford, on "Typical Forms of Christianity," afterwards published together in book form.

Another most welcome publication, which came to us from Leiden, was the volume of Proceedings of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Thinkers and Workers, at Amsterdam in 1903, under the title "Religion and Liberty."

Under the heading of Lectures we may also record the very pleasant and helpful Summer Session for Sunday-school Teachers held at Manchester College, Oxford, early in July.

Ministerial Changes.

There have been many ministerial changes during the year. The Rev. S. Farrington has resigned his charge at Richmond, and has retired from the active ministry after fifty years of service in America and this country. The Rev. E. Allen, of Walmsley, the Rev. W. Harrison, of Stalybridge, and the Rev. J. K. Smith, of Belper, have also retired, after long terms of service. New comers into our ministry are the Rev. F. B. Mott, of Southport, who had been in America, and the Rev. C. Craddock, of the Ancient Chapel Toxteth, Liverpool, who was formerly a Congregational minister; also, coming as students from college, the Rev. Gertrud von Petzold, of the Narborough-road Church, Leicester (the first woman in our connection to receive the full charge of a congregation in this country), the Revs. E. Lockett, of Pudsey, F. Hankinson assistant, Essex Church, Kensington, H. Dawtrey (assistant), Upper Chapel, Sheffield, Simon Jones, Pontypridd, and W. A. Weatherall, Crumlin.

Other ministerial changes have been: The Rev. J. Collins Odgers from Bury to Ullet-road, Liverpool, the Rev. W. J. Jupp from the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, Liverpool, to Croydon, J. H. Weatherall from Carmarthen to Bolton, E. D. Priestly Evans from Kidderminster to Bury, Rudolf Davis from Evesham to Bridgwater as District Minister to the Western Union, the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor from Hackney to Reading, the Rev. N. Anderton from Preston to Pendleton, the Rev. C. Travers from Carlisle to Preston, the Rev. W. G. Price from Hinckley to Stalybridge, the Rev. W. L. Tucker from Flowery Field to Stamford-street, London, the Rev. J. Ellis from Mansford-street to be District Minister of the Yorkshire Union, the Rev. Gordon Cooper from Kensington to Mansford-street, Bethnal-green, the Rev. H. Fisher Short from Aberdare to Crewe, the Rev. R. McGee from Colne to Blackpool, the Rev. J. M. Whiteman from Dewsbury to Burnley. The Rev. Philemon Moore has returned to Carmarthen, the Rev. G. A. Ferguson has settled at Gateshead, H. Rylett at Tenterden, T. Paxton at Newhall Hill, Birmingham, W. R. Shanks at Holbeck, E. S. L. Buckland at Derby, F. W. Turland at Flowery Field, while the Rev P. Prime has resigned his charge at Heaton Moor, H. M. Levins at Brighton, R. H. Greaves at Highgate, H. S. Perris at Little Portland-street, H. Rawlings at Denton, J. M. Connell at Exeter, J. E. Stronge at Kilburn (to go to Kidderminster), and J. H. Wicksteed as District Minister in London.

OBITUARY.

The year's obituary includes the names of the Duke of Cambridge, President Kruger, Bishops Ridding of Southwell, Bardsley of Carlisle, and Perowne, formerly of Worcester, Dean Hole, Canon Ainger and Dr. Mackennal of Bowdon, Sir William Harcourt, Sir Edwin Arnold Sir Leslie Stephen, Sir Henry Thompson, and George Frederick Watts, Maurus Jokai (the great Hungarian novelist and patriot), Verestchagin (the famous Russian painter of war scenes, who went down with Admiral Makaroff in the Petropavlovsk, at Port Arthur), Dvorak, Dr. Herzl (the Zionist leader), Professor York Powell and Dr. Fowler, of Oxford, Mr. C. H. Hopwood, Samuel Smiles, Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, Frances Power Cobbe, Ellice Hopkins, Antoinette Sterling, and Lady Dilke.

From our own roll of ministers we have lost the Revs. Joseph Freeston, J. R. Wilson, T. R. Elliott, H. McKean, and John Davies; and from the immediate circle of our friends many bearers of honoured names, such as Harry Rawson, George Stanley Darbishire, William C. Jolly, J. T. Preston, William Thornely, Richard Enfield, Alfred Paget, Thomas Gladstone, Sir Thomas Frost, Messrs. J. P. Thomasson, James Arlosh, Henry Green, Humphrey Wood, Dr. Polley and Dr. Hyndman of Belfast, Mrs. R. D. Darbishire, Mrs. Joseph Buckton, Mrs. Elam, Mrs. Mabyn Read, Mrs. Weir, Mrs. Jenkin Davies, Miss Edith Lupton, and Mrs. Charles W. Jones. These are but a few of those who have passed on from the fellowship of our churches, but not out of that communion in which is our abiding strength, and the benediction of our deeper life.

COPIES FOR FREE LIBRARIES.—A large number of copies of THE INQUIRER are sent each week to free libraries all over the world, and each year friends have kindly come forward to defray the cost. This year we are glad to say all the copies were paid for in this way, and we trust we shall be able to secure as good a response for 1905.

THE RELIGIOUS LITERATURE OF 1904.

IT is an impossible task to give, even in outline, an account of the religious literature of the year. Books issue in a ceaseless stream from the press, and many of them, fortunately, do not survive more than a few weeks. We can only refer to a few that have come under our own notice, which may be of special interest to our readers and have some claim upon continued life. Occasionally it happens that a year is notable for the appearance of a book which is read widely and debated keenly, either on account of its real greatness or because it hits the popular mood of the moment. "Lux Mundi" was a book of this kind, and so, in a less degree, was F. W. H. Myers' work on "Human Personality and its Survival after Bodily Death." 1904 has not been remarkable in this way. Perhaps it has reached a fairly high average of excellence in some departments, but we have had no book which marks an epoch or foreshadows a crisis. While the propaganda of the protectionist is rampant in other directions, the policy of protection against German theology is breaking down apparently all along the line. It is true that we still hear faint echoes of the old suspicion and dislike, but on the whole our theology is not quite so insular as it used to be. It belongs less to ecclesiastical coteries, who measure everything by their tradition, and more to the world of educated men. Among the foreign products presented to us in native dress during the past year we may mention Jülicher's "Introduction to the New Testament," adorned with a preface by Mrs. Humphry Ward; a voluminous "Life of Jesus," by Professor Oscar Holtzmann; the second volume of the "Beginnings of Christianity," by Professor Paul Wernle, conspicuous for its confident and rather slashing judgments; "Faith and Morals," by Dr. Wilhelm Herrmann, an able piece of controversial writing by one of the leaders of the Ritschlian school; and, perhaps most important of all, the first volume of Harnack's "Mission und Ausbreitung des Christentums"; the "Expansion of Christianity," translated by Dr. James Moffatt The appearance of Réville's "Liberal Christianity" and "The Religions of Authority and the Religion of the Spirit," by the late Auguste Sabatier, show our rapidly increasing indebtedness to the school of liberal thinkers in France. The latter is a posthumous work, which never received the author's final revision, but it has all the clearness of style, the breadth of intellectual vision, and the deep religious feeling of his other books. Fortunately, the English books which we have to range beside these products of German and French scholarship have nothing to fear from the competition. Canon Driver has published a commentary on the Book of Genesis, in which he makes good use of the results of the study of anthropology and folk lore to illustrate the patriarchal narratives. It reveals how decisive is the change in the study of the Old Testament literature. It has emerged at last for most educated people into the clear daylight of humanistic culture. Dr. A. B. Davidson's "Theology of the Old Testament" covers a much larger canvas.

It has been prepared from his manuscript, not without difficulty, by Principal Salmond of Aberdeen. Its point of view is that of a gradual unfolding of religion and its ideas through a long process of historical development. Among books dealing with the New Testament we may mention the first part of a work by Professor V. H. Stanton on "The Gospels as Historical Documents," which has been planned upon a large scale. Its exact and varied scholarship reflects fresh lustre upon the Cambridge Divinity School. Dr. Drummond's volume on "The Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel" attracted considerable attention upon its appearance, on account both of i s scholarly defence of the Johannine authorship and its deep religious insight. Quite recently Professor Ramsay has issued a very interesting volume entitled "The Letters to the Seven Churches." It is far more than a commentary upon a section of the Book of Revelation, for the author uses all the resources of his knowledge of topography and antiquities to give a vivid picture of the cities of Asia Minor with their curious mingling of Greek and Oriental civilisation. The fifth or supplementary volume of Hastings' "Dictionary of the Bible" contains a number of articles of importance to the student. Thus, Professor Schürer writ s on the Diaspora, Professor Kautzsch on the Religion of Israel, Principal Drummond on Philo, Dr. Rendel Harris on the Sibylline Oracles, and Professor Ramsay on the "Religion of Greece and Asia Minor" and "Roads and Travel in the New Testament." The volume is, in fact, a collection of valuable monographs rather than part of a book of reference in the ordinary sense. Among other books dealing with semi-Biblical subjects we should like to call attention to Mr. Bevan's series of admirable lectures on Jerusalem under the High Priests. It is the most vivid popular description of the period between Nehemiah and the New Testament with which we are acquainted, and at the same time it is the work of a scholar who has a wide and accurate knowledge of the original authorities. Mr. R. T. Herford's "Christianity in Talmud and Midrash" has been noticed at length already in these columns. It stands in a class apart, appealing probably only to a select circle of readers, but securing for its author the reputation of a sound scholar and the position of an authority upon his special subject.

When we leave the Biblical field the task of selection and classification becomes more difficult. We must not omit to mention Professor J. E. Carpenter's small book on "The Place of Christianity among the Religions of the World," in which he has republished a series of articles written originally for the INQUIRER. It is valuable specially on account of the admirable survey which it contains of the growth of the study of Comparative Religion.

We are beginning to look forward to the yearly volume of the St. Margaret's Lectures with special interest. Last year Canon Henson gave us his volume on "English Religion in the Seventeenth Century." This year Mr. F. C. Burkitt takes us into the much less familiar field of "Early Eastern Christianity." The importance of the Syriac-speaking Church, as embodying an interpretation of Christian truth independent, for the most part, of the orthodox Western tradition, has been hardly recognised sufficiently. At a time when we are learning to distinguish between an original experience or revelation and its interpretation, a book like Mr. Burkitt's has a special significance. Many readers will be attracted also by the pleasant novelty of the subject. The noble translation of the "Hymn of the Soul," which is placed before the year A.D. 224, is perhaps the most striking thing which the book contains. In the more familiar periods of church history a number of books of merit have appeared, but the year, on the whole, has been a rather barren one. Mr. Frere has published his volume on the "English Church in the Reigns of Elizabeth and James I."; Abbott Gasquet has given us an admirable account of English Monastic Life in a new series of Antiquary's Books issued by Messrs. Methuen; and "The Old Service Books of the English Church," in the same series, is of importance for English liturgiology in the Middle Ages. Several Franciscan books of interest to the ordinary reader or the special student have been published. The Temple Classics has enlarged its delightful section of Franciscan translations by the addition of the "Sacrum Commercium," translated by Canon Rawnsley, and St. Bonaventura's "Life of St. Francis," translated by Miss Salter. After an interval of about two years the "Collection d'Etudes et de Documents" has made progress with the publication of the Latin text of two lives of St. Anthony of Padua, edited by M. Léon de Kerval. The first volume of the "Opuscules de Critique Historique" has been issued, and two numbers of Vol. II. have reached us. But we must not allow the wiles of a favourite study to entice us further into the thicket of French and German monographs.

In modern religious biography we can allow ourselves only to mention two or three books at the most. We have had the "Letters of Bishop Stubbs," "The Life of Liddon," and the "Life and Letters of Bishop Creighton." Of these the latter will attract by far the largest number of readers. It is an admirable piece of work, with the right touch of intimacy and hero-worship, and at the same time candid and human. Dr. Barry's appreciation of Cardinal Newman is of special interest because it is written from the Roman Catholic point of view. The brief autobiography, delicate in insight and exquisite in style, in which F. W. H. Myers has told the story of his spiritual life, is the most beautiful human document of the year. It is to be found in his "Fragments of Prose and Poetry."

Into the voluminous literature of the pulpit we cannot enter here. Sermons, good, bad, and indifferent, come from the press in a full and continuous stream. We suppose that some of them find readers. Here and there, however, there is a voice which speaks with real life and power through the printed page. This has been the case pre-eminently with the successive volumes of Phillips Brooks' sermons. The tenth series has been published recently with the title "Seeking Life, and other Sermons." Accompanying it is an editorial note to the effect that no more will be issued. The decision is probaby a wise one, for it is desirable to have only the best to represent a man when he is gone. It is the opportunity to express our gratitude. These are volumes full of stimulus and vitality upon which the dust is not allowed to settle. They belong to the same class as Robertson of Brighton's, the "Parochial and Plain Sermons" and the "Endeavours after the Christian Life."

Sixpenny books have invaded the market in a veritable flood during the past year. They are not always pleasant to tired eyes or lovers of ample margins, but they are welcome evidence of the popular interest in serious religious questions. The Rationalist Press Association has maintained its activity, and many of the other sixpenny volumes are intended evidently to counteract the influence or answer the arguments of its publications. Evidently for the present the true policy for those who wish to find readers is to issue sixpenny books and get them into the shops and on to the bookstalls through the ordinary channels. Dr. Warschauer's "Anti-Nunquam" is a case in point. It was observed recently in an Oxford bookseller's between two volumes of very orthodox theology. Apart from its intrinsic merits as a vigorous piece of thinking expressed in popular language, it has had a fair chance of making a wide popular appeal, and we commend, as worthy of imitation, the wisdom of avoiding special labels and denominational publishers.

The foregoing rapid and imperfect sketch of the religious literature of the year has impressed us once more with its defective side. There is a striking and lamentable absence of really constructive work in religious thought. We excel in criticism and literary study and half-hearted apologetic. We can trace the evolution of doctrines which we have ceased to believe, and of symbolism which has become too artificial for our use; but for a real co-ordination of the facts of religious experience and the Christian revelation with modern knowledge we look in vain. The signs of its coming are not yet. Our age, with all its learning, cannot produce anything comparable in theological significance to Calvin's "Institutes" or the "Summa" of St. Thomas Aquinas. We are good critics; but it is doubtful whether we have much claim to be considered good thinkers.

W. H. D.

THE many friends in this country of the Rev. W. H. and Mrs. Fish will be interested to hear that after his two years' ministry at Salt Lake City they are returning to their old home in Boston. Mr. and Mrs. Fish endeared themselves to large circles of friends during their stay in this country, both in London and at Kidderminster, and good wishes will follow them in their new sphere of activity.

IF we never teach the astronomy or the chemistry of our fathers, why should we be so anxious to foreclose the growth of religious life by the imposition of the creeds of our fathers?—Frank Walters.

TWO CHAPEL HISTORIES.*

Two well-printed histories, one English, one American, which have been waiting some time for notice are now before us. The one deals with upwards of two centuries of religious life and work at Dob-lane, Failsworth, near Manchester; the other with a century of village Unitarianism at Trenton, in the State of New York. Both serve to show how a particular type of religious feeling tends to persist in any locality in which it has once been well rooted. The sturdy independence and self-reliance of the Puritan inhabitants of Newton in the 17th century are reflected in the general attitude towards religious matters of successive generations at Dob-lane, in spite of doctrinal change. The broad outlook of Van der Kemp and other founders of the church at Trenton, and their distrust of complex doctrinal formularies, determined the subsequent course of this society in the Unitarian direction.

Mr. Gordon, in his account of Dob-lane Chapel, clears up much that was hitherto obscure in the early history of the place. He shows how the roots of this religious society go back into the Puritan period, and regards as significant the fact that the press from which the Marprelate Tracts issued was run to earth in Newton-lane in 1589. He has made good use of material rendered more accessible by the publications of the Chetham Society bearing on the early history of Nonconformity. Although John Walker, M.A., the incumbent of Newton chapelry (in which Failsworth was included) gave up his living when the Act of Uniformity came into force, his followers did not immediately form a separate religious society. This is explained by the fact that Walker's successor, Thomas Lawton, "though a Conformist, was a minister of the Puritan type." His services were acceptable to the Puritans of Newton, and they waited on his ministry, but at the same time held occasional services at their own houses. Lawton died in 1688, and then, under the leadership of Nathaniel Scholes, one of Frankland's students, the Nonconformists of the neighbourhood set about providing a religious home of their own. Land was conveyed to Scholes and four others in 1698, on which a building "containing three bays" was put up. The trust deed was not drawn up till 1706, and its defining words are simply to "permit the edifice to be used for a place of meeting of Protestant Dissenters, for the public exercise of religious worship according to the liberty of the Toleration Act."

The subsequent history of Dob-lane follows much the same lines as that of other chapels in the district. Mr. Gordon is happy in the manner in which he links on events in the history of Dob-lane with the general movement of Nonconformity, thus illustrating one by the other. When feeling ran high during the Jacobite rebellion in 1715, "the Chappell was Broken" by a mob. In 1738 the building of a "Chapel House" was begun. The accounts of disbursements for the work and for the refreshment of the workers are full of interest. The list of ministers and ministerial supplies is a long one, containing no less than thirty names. Of the ministers, Robert Robinson, Pendlebury Houghton, and William Hawkes made perhaps as great a mark as any in the list. There were two periods in the history of the chapel in which the services were taken by supplies. From 1790 to 1803 the tutors and students of the Manchester Academy had charge of Dob-lane, and from 1864 to 1867 the pulpit was supplied by students of the Unitarian Home Missionary Board. In the first period the services of such eminent ministerial supplies as Lewis Loyd, William Stevenson, and George Walker, F.S.A., revived the drooping congregation. One of the lessons to be learnt from the history of this chapel is the value of holding on to a place. If the congregation had been disbanded when it was reduced to three or four families, all the splendid work of recent years in the day school, Sunday-school, and chapel would not have been done, and many lives would be the poorer. The account of the Sunday-school and the publication of the Register of Baptisms and Burials, 1691-1807, greatly enhance the local interest of the book. The volume is enriched by illustrations, those of the New Chapel (1879) and the schools are rather small, the portraits are a better size. We do not see any reference to the Communion vessels and bowl belonging to this chapel. The accession of several members from the Methodist New Connexion, followers of Joseph Barker, about the middle of the last century, introduced a freshening strain to which we are indebted for the ministry amongst us of Edward Allen, who joined the Dob-lane congregation at that period. Mr. Gordon tells us all this in his usual entertaining manner, and unravels the tangled skein of history with ease.

Turning to the history of the Reformed Christian (Unitarian) Church of Trenton, by Mr. Graves, we have a pleasantly-written account of a church already known to English Unitarians from the references made to it in Belsham's "Memoirs of Theophilus Lindsey." Mr. Graves might indeed have supplied some further details by a larger use of the materials in those memoirs. The church at Oldenbarneveld, or Trenton, as it came to be called, kept in touch with English Unitarians for many years. Pamphlets and tracts were supplied to it from the Old Country, and the Misses Prime, of St. Albans, sent £10, through Mr. Belsham, "for the use of the chapel." According to a statement dated November 20, 1822, this money appears to have been spent in paying off arrears due to "the Register" and in buying a stove. This church owes its origin to Colonel Mappa and Francis Adrian Van der Kemp, both exiles from Holland owing to their efforts "to substitute for the oligarchical constitution a representative government which would secure to their country the blessings of civil liberty." Van der Kemp had been minister of a Baptist church in Leyden, where he declined to subscribe to "a creed which all former ministers had complied with." We need not wonder, then, that the church they founded placed the principle of religious liberty in the forefront; the wonder to Englishmen is that more such churches were not planted up and down the land in which the political atmosphere appeared to be so favourable. But the prevailing type of religion in the States was strongly orthodox and in New York State strongly Calvinistic, so this little church was isolated. As Mr. Graves puts it, "they had to go it alone from the start." Their first regular minister was John Sherman, who settled with them late in 1805 or early in 1806. Mr. Graves does not tell us that it was through an attentive perusal of the works of Lindsey and Priestley that Sherman had become "a sincere and zealous convert to the doctrine of the proper Unity and sole Supremacy of God, to the simple humanity of Jesus Christ, and to the appropriation of religious worship to the Father only," but such was the case. He says: "There is little on record concerning the ministry of Mr. Sherman." There is, however, a vivid account of his work in a letter of Van der Kemp to Mrs. Lindsey, dated November 5, 1807, which might well have been included. Sherman's ministry did not last many years; there was difficulty in raising his stipend. But the members were not to be daunted; a few of them read sermons in turn, and at length, in 1814, the Rev. Isaac B. Pevice was called to the ministry. During his twenty-seven years' service the church was built, and the congregation consolidated, and since his day has continued to hold its own.

Difficulties arising from the migration of population and the need of raising funds seem to be pretty much the same in country congregations on both sides of the Atlantic. In one point this American church contrasts strongly with Dob-lane. Till recently the latter was entirely administered by the trustees; in the former there was a regularly constituted "church," which had supreme power, according to the customary Congregational method. The "Bond of Union," subscribed as a covenant by the members of this Reformed Christian Church, appears to us sensible and helpful.

The book is rendered more attractive by its capital illustrations and the plan of the pews, reminding one of an English Meeting House. These two histories show that our churches on both sides of the Atlantic are capable of producing men and women full of interest in the welfare of the general community.

SHORT NOTICES.

A NEW and cheaper edition, in one volume, of the Life of Frances Power Cobbe, as told by Herself, has been issued since her death, with additions by the author, and an Introduction by Blanche Atkinson (her literary executor). Miss Cobbe's own additions were made in 1898. The most substantial are at the end of Chapter 17, on "London in the Sixties and Seventies," telling of Gladstone and Froude. At the end of Chapter 20, on "The Claims of the Brutes," the foundation of the British Union is recorded, and to the last chapter some brief final notes are added, with some touching verses addressed in 1873 to her friend, Miss Lloyd. Miss Atkinson's Introduction tells more of the last years, and is a warm tribute of admiration from one who worked with Miss Cobbe, and was admitted to a close intimacy during those years. The great success of her autobiography, when it was first published in 1894, was an unexpected pleasure to Miss Cobbe. This new edition will bring it within the reach of a much larger circle of friends. (Sonnenschein. 7s. 6d.)

Poems of 1848 and Earlier Days, translated by E. Robinson. In this volume Mrs. Richard Robinson has collected translations she has made of poems by Victor Hugo, Béranger, Heine, Chamisso, and others, including the words of a number of well-known Beethoven, Schubert, and Schumann songs. She speaks modestly of the work which employed "many hours of enforced idleness during the past twenty years," and commends to others "the fascination of the puzzle how to find the exact equivalent for the words" to be translated. She has felt the fascination of Heine, and has attempted nearly a hundred of his poems; but the magic of his verse will hardly go into English. The three Heine poems in Mr. Thomas's "Hortulus Pastoris" are here also, and it is interesting to compare the renderings. One charming little poem, "Zwei Kammern hat das Herz," Mrs. Robinson has hardly dealt with so literally as is her wont. Her version "Two tremors share the heart" misses the point of the two separate chambers in the heart, wherein joy and sorrow dwell apart. The lines are given as by "Kühnen," but in Buchheim's Deutsche Lyrik the original appears as by H. Neumann. At the end of the book is an interesting rendering of the "Hâvamâl," the Book of Proverbs of the Icelandic Edda, from which we will quote two sentences:—

No worse wayfarer hath a man with him
Than drunkenness,
Not so good as some may deem
Is ale to the sons of men,
For the more a man drinketh, the less
Hath he the might of his mind.

* * * *

The worthless man meaneth to live for ever,
When he flyeth from fight;
Yet age at last no peace granteth,
Though the spear spare him.

The old alliterative manner furnishes an exercise as interesting for the translator as modern rhyme. (Manchester: Sherratt & Hughes. 3s. 6d. net.)

Blessed be the Thorn-bearer, and other Papers, by William C. Gannett, is issued in a little shilling volume, a companion to the previous issue of "Blessed be Drudgery." The other papers are "Of Faces and their Making" and "The House Beautiful," all three being taken from the well-known little volume, "On making Oneself Beautiful," published by the Author in America in 1899. "The House Beautiful" should be in every home. (Glasgow: David Bryce.)

A cheap re-issue in paper-covered booklets of George Macdonald's Fairy Tales is sure of a warm welcome by those who have long known the fascination of these stories, and will be glad to make them known to the new children. There are five volumes, The Light Princess, The Day Boy and the Night Girl, Cross Purposes and the Carasoyn, The Shadows and Little Daylight, The Giant's Heart and the Golden Key. (A. C. Fifield. 6d. net each.)

The Hungry Forties, Life under the Bread Tax, edited with an introduction by Mrs. Cobden Unwin, gathers up many testimonies of those trying times, and is dedicated "to those who in his native village of Heyshott have known and loved Richard Cobden." (Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

Four volumes of sermons by representative Nonconformist ministers, such as Principal Adeney, Dr. Alfred Rowland, the Revs. J. G. Greenhough, and T. Rhondda Williams, on Men of the Old Testament (two vols.); Men of the Bible (Some Lesser-known Characters); and Women of the Bible (Rebekah to Priscilla), are issued by Mr. James Robinson, Bridge-street, Manchester. 3s. 6d. net each.)

Courses of Study, edited by John M. Robertson, is an elaborate work, which aims to guide the reading of the ordinary man in history, philosophy, theology, morals, economics, and the arts and sciences. The matter is clearly arranged, and there are indexes of subjects and authors. (Watts & Co.)

A new issue of First Principles, by Herbert Spencer, in pleasant binding, and with a fine reproduction of the bust by Onslow Ford, will be welcomed by those who wish to acquire the volumes of the "Synthetic Philosophy." (Williams & Norgate. 7s. 6d.)

The Divine Presence, by Martin R. Smith.—The title of this small volume hardly prepares us for its contents. The writer describes his aim as an attempt to commend the conception of an Omnipotent God, Infinitely Righteous, Infinitely Loving. It seems a pity that he should begin with the confident expectation that many readers will regard his ideas as "the dreams of an excited imagination," for he has allowed it to communicate a certain truculence to his attitude and some excitement to his style. Where he is developing his own thought without reference to dissimilar opinion he has much to say that deserves attention, and he is always very earnest, but a great deal of his space is devoted to criticism of what he calls the Christian religion, and here he often shows himself unable to understand what he is attacking. His chapter on "Mediation" is singularly perverse and superficial. Here is an instance—"The one great ineradicable error and evil of Christianity is that it interposes Christ between God and man; interposes the figure of Jesus hiding all the glory of God, as the moon hides the face of the sun in a total eclipse." He thinks it "an insult to the Divine Love that man should approach God through a Mediator." But the problem is, of course, not so much how man approaches God, but how God approaches man, and still more what are the facts which have convinced men that God has approached them.

In another place he argues that the expression, "The Forgiveness of Sin" does much to confuse the relations between man and his Maker. His own thesis scarcely relieves the confusion, inasmuch as it presents "sin and folly" as "the means which Omniscient Wisdom sees to be necessary for the education of human spirits." "They are the steps he lovingly provides for them." He adds the hazardous prediction that when man comes to take this view of his sins they "will cause him a remorse and shame never before experienced." That is a very astonishing statement. NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Ainsworth.—On Sunday, Dec. 18, special sermons were preached in the Presbyterian Chapel by the Rev. Dr. Warschauer, as representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. The subject of the afternoon discourse was, "Only Believe," and the evening, "Agnosticism and Religion." There were good congregations, and special anthems were sung. A collection was taken on behalf of the mission. On Monday evening Dr. Warschauer gave a very interesting and humorous lecture in the schoolroom, on "The Light Side of Oxford," Alderman Thos. Holt presiding.

Colne (Appointment).—The Rev. John Evans, B.A., of Bolton, has accepted the invitation of the congregation to the pastorate of this church.

Derby.——Friargate has had many happy and prosperous bazaars, but none happier or more successful than that held on December 1-3, when the proceeds amounted to nearly £230. The result attained meant sheer hard work, great self-sacrifice, a spirit of religious benevolence, and a unitedness and common friendship amongst the members of the congregation, most encouraging to all who have the cause at heart. The bazaar was opened upon the three successive days by Lady Roe, Mrs. Charles Wibberley, and Mrs. J. C. Warren, of Nottingham. The respective chairmen were Mr. W. J. Piper, the editor of the Derby Daily Telegraph, a very old member of Friargate, whose influence in the public life of Derby is second to none; on the second day Mr. Alderman Ann, J.P.; and on the third Mr. Wibberley, who was taught in the Sunday school at Friargate, has held all the official chapel positions, and though now residing in Rhodesia, does not forget his old friends and his religious home. Among those who took part in the proceedings were the Hon. Frederick Strutt, who followed the chairman on the opening day, and the Rev. Howard James, minister of the leading Baptist chapel in Derby, who made a cordial and sympathetic speech, in which he referred in appreciative terms to the social work and the literary labours of his former near neighbour at Nottingham, the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, and of his indebtedness to the works of Channing and their influence upon his life, for more and more in private conduct and religious revealing, he made that sainted author his constant guide, philosopher, and friend.

Exeter.—On Tuesday, December 13, the Rev T. W. Chignell celebrated his eightieth birthday, having been minister of George's Chapel since 1862. The local Echo of the following Saturday published some notes of congratulation, in which many friends will cordially join, and recalled some old Exeter memories, including that of the connection of Sir John Bowring with the chapel.

Flowery Field, Hyde. (Welcome Meeting).—The annual congregational gathering was held on Saturday week (December 19, 1878, being the day on which the church was opened), and the opportunity was taken to welcome the Rev. W. F. Turland, the newly appointed minister. Mr. Aaron Cresswell presided, and, in offering a welcome to Mr. Turland, expressed their great regret at the absence of the Rev. H. E. Dowson, who was abroad, on account of ill-health. Mr. Mark Barnes, on behalf of congregation and school, spoke in terms of cordial welcome, recalling the ministries of the Revs. J. Kertain Smith, Harold Rylett, and W. L. Tucker, and looking forward hopefully to the future. Mr. Whyatt followed, and then the Rev. W. Harrison, on behalf of the East Cheshire Union, and the Rev. H. S. Tayler, on behalf of the S.S. Union. The Rev. W. Dinning, of another religious connection, expressed his pleasure at being invited to be present and his good wishes, and was followed by the Revs. A. R. Andreae and Lawrence Scott. Mr. Turland gratefully acknowledged the welcome accorded to him, referring with special pleasure to Mr. Dinning's presence, and impressing it upon his hearers that their success must depend on minister and people together.

London: Peckham (Resignation).—The Rev G. Carter having resigned the Avondale-road pulpit, stating his decision to be irrevocable, the following resolution has been passed at a special meeting of the congregation: "That this congregation accepts the Rev. G. Carter's resignation with great regret, and while thanking him for past services, trusts that he may long be spared to enjoy good health and continued usefulness." Mr. Carter will close his long ministry in Peckham at the end of February.

Manchester: Pendleton.—At the Sunday School Christmas Party on Monday evening the Rev. Neander Anderton, in his "Christmas Greeting" said that it was very gratifying to note the steady increase in the Sunday-school attendances during the last month or to, especially in the morning school, and he hoped this increase would be maintained in the coming year. Messrs. J. Milner and J. Wigley, as superintendents, also spoke a few words of encouragement to the children, and the prizes for regular attendance were distributed by Mrs. Anderton.

Trebanos.—On Christmas evening a very successful sacred concert was held at the Unitarian Church, the Rev. T. J. Jenkins presiding. The present religious revival in Wales has created quite an awakening in this church. The young people are always ready to do all they can to promote the good cause. Last Sunday morning, at 7.30, a women's prayer meeting was held. Many availed themselves of the opportunity, and very heartily took part by reading portions of the Bible and praying. Every Sunday evening at 5 p.m. a meeting for the young people is held, when many come forward on each occasion to read, pray, or to give short addresses. During the week a Christian Endeavour is held on Tuesday evenings, women's meeting on Wednesday evenings, a prayer-meeting on Thursday evenings, and a Band of Hope on Friday evenings; and it is hoped that the good seed sown will produce an abundant harvest.

Kilburn, Lewisham and Plumstead Church Building Funds.

AN APPEAL FOR £7,500.

THE Committee of the London District Unitarian Society urgently appeal to their fellow members of the Unitarian body on behalf of these three energetic and progressive congregations.

Kilburn, Lewisham, and Plumstead have already amply vindicated their right to exist, and are deserving of our most generous support.

Church buildings have now become essential to secure their position, and ensure their continued progress. Excellent freehold sites have been secured, and in the case of Kilburn and Plumstead wholly paid for. A church building at Lewisham will save the congregation a yearly outlay of £70 for hire of a chapel.

Energetic ministers are in charge of the congregations.

This appeal is warmly commended by the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association on behalf of the Committee.

HOWARD CHATFEILD CLARKE, President.

Contributions will be gratefully acknowledged by the Hon. Treasurers of the Appeal Fund.
